him "such articles of necessity and convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use and comfort, instruction and convenience, or protection." In Jordan v. Fall River R. Co., 5 Cush. 69, the rule is stated to be "that baggage includes such articles as are of necessity or convenience for personal use, and such as is usual for persons traveling to take with them." In Johnson v. Stone, 11 Humph. 419, the court said: "It is not practical to state with precise accuracy what shall be included by the term 'baggage.' It certainly includes articles of necessity and personal convenience usually carried by passengers for their personal use; and what these may be will very much depend upon the habits, tastes and resources of the passenger." In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 263, 20 L. ed. 428, Mr. Justice Field said that the contract "to carry the person only implies an undertaking to transport such a limited quantity of articles as are ordinarily taken by travelers for personal use and convenience, such quantity depending, of course, upon the station of the party, the object and length of his journey, and many other considerations." In Maerow v. Great Western R. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 612, Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "Whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use and convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of the journey, must be considered as personal luggage. This would include," he continues, "not only articles of apparel, whether for use or ornament, . . . but also the gun-case or fishing apparatus of the sportsman, the easel of the artist on a sketching tour, or the books of the student, and other articles of analogous character, the use of which is personal to the traveler, and the taking of which has arisen from the fact of his journeying. On the other hand, the term 'ordinary luggage' being thus confined to that which is personal to the passenger, and carried for his use and convenience, it follows that what is carried for the purpose of business, such as merchandise and the like, or for larger and ulterior purposes, such as articles of furniture or household goods, would not come within the description of 'ordinary luggage' unless accepted as such by the carrier." See also 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, Baggage, 1042; 9 Rorer, Railroads, 968; Hutch. Carr. §§ 677, 688, 689. So that it would seem that baggage, in the sense of the law, may consist of such articles of apparel as, through necessity, convenience, comfort or recreation, the passenger may take for his personal use, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or the ultimate purpose of the journey. The question what articles of property, as to quantity and value, contained in a trunk, may be deemed baggage within the rule, is to be determined by the jury according to the circumstances of the case, subject to the power of the court to correct any abuse. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fratloff, 100 U. S. 24, 25 L. ed. 581; Bomar v. Maxwell, 9 Humph. 622; Brook v. Gale, 14 Fla. 528; Maurits v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 765.

As the contract of the carrier of passengers is to carry a reasonable amount of baggage for the accommodation of the passenger, it follows from the nature and object of the contract, as observed by Appleton, Ch. J., "that the right of the passenger is limited to the baggage required for his pleasure, convenience and necessity during the journey." Wilson v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 56 Me. 62. Articles of whatever kind that do not properly come within the description of ordinary baggage are not included within the terms of such contract, nor is the carrier liable for their loss or destruction, in the absence of negligence. Stage properties, costumes, paraphernalia, advertising matter, etc., are not articles required for the pleasure or convenience or necessity of the passenger during his journey, but are plainly intended for the larger or ulterior purposes of carrying on the theatrical business. They do not fall, therefore, under the denomination of "baggage," and, in the absence of negligence, no liability can arise against the carrier for their loss or destruction, unless accepted as baggage by the carrier. And so the special verdict of the jury found. They segregated the articles which might properly be termed "baggage" from those carried for the purposes of business, and found separately the value of each, but by their general verdict found the Company liable for the full value of the property upon the assumption that the trunks and their contents were received by the Company as baggage. The bill of exceptions discloses that the court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "There is another phase of this question. If you find from all the evidence in the case that these trunks were brought to the agent of the Company, and their appearance indicated that they might not only contain the personal baggage, in the strict sense of the word, of the party, but that other things than baggage were received without objection, and no fraud or concealment was practiced by the plaintiff, if the trunks on their face advertised fully what their contents were, and their agents received them under these circumstances, and gave checks for them, and the Company, through these agents and employes, took them into its charge without making any objection, then the defendant is to be deemed to have taken these articles as baggage," etc. In substance, the complaint alleges that the defendant was fully informed of the contents of the trunks prior to their delivery, and that the defendant received and checked them as baggage, which is put in issue by the denials of the answer. Although the bill of exceptions contains no evidence, nor is any certified to us by this record, the issue permitted, and the instruction was designed to meet, the evidence upon this phase of the case. Under such circumstances, we are bound to assume that there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had notice of the nature of the property, and received it as baggage for transportation. In this view, the general verdict is not inconsistent with the special findings, for if the defendant knowingly permitted the plaintiff to take as baggage articles that would not come under that description, it is liable for their loss, though not arising from its negligence. While it is true that passenger carriers are not liable for merchandise and the like when packed up with a traveler's baggage, if the baggage be lost, yet if the merchandise be so packed as to be obviously merchandise to the eye, and the carrier takes it without objection, he is liable for the loss. Story, Bailm. § 499. Thus, in the case of Great Northern R. Co. v. Shepherd, 8 Exch. 80, Parke, B., said: "If the plaintiff had carried these articles exposed, or had packed them in the shape of merchandise, so that the company might have known what they were, and they had chosen to treat them as personal luggage, and carry them without demanding any extra remuneration, they would have been responsible for the loss. So also upon any limit in point of weight, if the company chose to allow a passenger to carry more, they would be liable." And in Macross v. Great Western R. Co., supra, Cockburn, Ch. J., said: "If the carrier permits the passenger, either on payment or without payment of an extra charge, to take more than the regulated quantity of luggage, or knowingly permits him to take as personal luggage articles that would not come under that denomination, he will be liable for their loss, though not arising from his negligence." In Sloman v. Great Western R. Co., 6 Hun, 546, Gilbert, J., after stating and citing authorities to sustain the proposition that railroad companies are not liable for the loss of merchandise delivered to them under the guise of baggage for transportation along with a passenger, said: "They are liable, if they knowingly undertake to transport merchandise in trunks or boxes, which have been received by them for transportation, in passenger trains, unless the agent who receives the packages for that purpose violates a regulation of the company by so doing, and the passenger or owner of the goods has notice of such regulation,"—citing Butler v. Hudson River R. Co. 8 E. D. Smith, 571, and other cases. See also 2 Wait, Act. and Def. 82. "Doubtless," said Mitchell, J., "if the carrier had actual notice of the nature of the property, and still received it as baggage, he would be liable." Haines v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 29 Minn. 161. So in Texas etc. R. Co. v. Cappe (Tex.), 16 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 118, it was held that where a railroad company, through its baggage or ticket agent, receives articles for transportation as baggage, knowing at the time that such articles are not properly baggage, the company will be responsible therefor as a common carrier, and will be estopped from denying that the same was baggage. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Conklin, 82 Kan. 55; Minter v. Pacific R. Co. 41 Mo. 508. Again, in Hoeger v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 63 Wis. 100, a traveling agent applied to a railroad company to transport his sample trunks as baggage, and the company, knowing their contents, received and checked them as baggage, and carried them as such on the passenger train on which he rode; and the court held that both parties were estopped to claim that such trunks were not baggage, and to be treated as such, and not as ordinary freight. So that, while the obligation of a carrier of passengers is limited to ordinary baggage, yet if it knowingly permits a passenger, either on payment or without payment of an extra charge, to take articles as personal baggage which are not properly such, it will be liable for their loss or destruction, though without fault. Now, the issue invites and the instruction indicates that there was evidence tending to prove that the contents of the trunks were fully advertised, and that the agent of the defendant knew that they contained, besides personal apparel, stage costumes and properties, and that they were received and checked as baggage; and in such case the defendant is liable for their loss, though without fault, as the jury have found by their verdict, and the court affirmed by its judgment.

In this view there is no inconsistency in the general verdict with the special findings, and the judgment must be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

John GLENNON

v.

LEBANON MANUFACTURING CO., App't.

(....Pa....)

Loss caused by the unskillful work of a servant may be set off against his claim for wages and the set-off is not limited to his wages for the particular days during which the damage was done.

(March 9, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lebanon County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages alleged to be due and unpaid. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Grant Weidman and Frank E. Mally, for appellant:

The damages sustained by appellant was a good defense pro tanto to the claim of appellee.

The formal plea of set-off was not necessary in order to enable the appellant to prove the damages and the circumstances out of which they arose.

Damages resulting to a master from his servant's non-performance, or negligent or unfaithful performance, of the work for which he was hired are ex contractu, and may, if capable of liquidation by any recognized measure, be set off against the servant's claim for wages.

Mr. John Benson, for appellee:

Damage done through carelessness and negligence is a wrong arising out of a tort, and cannot be set off in an action of assumpsit under our Defalcation Act.

Gogel v. Jacoby, 5 Serg. & R. 116; Hunt v. Gilmore, 59 Pa. 452.

When damage arises from a tort through the negligence or unskillful work of the plaintiff it cannot be set off in an action for assumpsit.

Zell v. Arnold, 2 Penr. & W. 292; M' Cahan v. Hirst, 7 Watts, 179.

Negligence in doing work may be proven in an action of assumpsit when directly connected with the cause of action, to prove failure of consideration of the promise to pay, but not as a set-off.

Price v. Lewis, 17 Pa. 51; Leech v. Baldwin, 5 Watts, 446; Blessing v. Miller, 102 Pa. 45.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a small case, yet it involves a question of some importance. It was not disputed that the plaintiff did certain work so unskillfully as to cause a loss to the defendant. The learned judge held that this loss could not be set off against the plaintiff's claim for wages, further than to the extent of the five or six days during which he was engaged upon the work which was so unskillfully done. It was contended by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that such set-off could not be allowed, because if the appellant (defendant) was injured by the imperfect work on the wheels, through the carelessness and negligence of the plaintiff, it is a wrong,—a tort; and redress cannot be obtained in this action of assumpsit by means of a set-off. We may concede that unliquidated damages arising from a tort growing out of a separate transaction cannot be set off in an

A recoupment may be allowed for loss sustained from plaintiff's negligence: but for this purpose a notice must be given to the plaintiff, and a definite statement of the claim filed. Dermott v. Jones, 64 U. S. 28 How. 220, 16 L. ed. 442. See Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 15 L. ed. 547.

defeated by proof of changes in the contract, in no wise involved in the controversy. Moellering v. Kayser, 9 West. Rep. 374, 110 Ind. 533.

All damages directly arising from the inferior work upon it, or inferior materials, may be proved against a demand for its price. Florida R. Co. v. Smith, 38 U. S. 21 Wall. 255, 22 L. ed. 513; Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. 14 How. 434, 14 L. ed. 437; Dermott v. Jones, 64 U. S. 23 How. 220, 16 L. ed. 442; Ingle v. Jones, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. ed. 762.

Evidence of delay contrary to the contract, and that the materials used and the workmanship were defective, is admissible. Winder v. Caldwell, supra. See notes to Helwig v. Laschowaki (Mich.) 10 L. R. A. 330; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Greer (Tenn.) 4 L. R. A. 359.

action of assumpsit. This is not such a case. The plaintiff is a machinist, and was employed in defendant's machine-shop to do certain mechanical work for a compensation agreed upon. From this contract the law implies faithful service on the part of the employé, and an amount of care and skill proportioned to the character of the work which he has engaged to perform. If he performs it negligently and unskillfully it is a breach of contract, and when the employer is sued for wages earned under the contract he can defend by showing a failure on the part of the servant to properly perform his part, in consequence of which he has sustained damages. It is not a question of set-off or of tort; it is an equitable defense, growing out of the contract itself, and going directly to its consideration. Leach v. Baldwin, 5 Watts, 446, was an action by a common carrier against the consignee to recover the price of carrying, and it was held that the defendant might set up as a defense negligence or want of skill in the carrier, by which the goods were deteriorated in value. It was said by Justice Huston, in delivering the opinion of the court: "It is simply whether a person who has undertaken to perform a service for hire, and has performed it so negligently or dishonestly as to occasion loss to his employer, can recover full compensation, as though all had been done according to the contract. All our decisions say he cannot so recover. The defendant, if he can prove any facts which go to show that the plaintiff did not perform his part of the contract, or from negligence or want of skill performed it in such a manner as that the defendant suffered loss, may have the amount of that loss, as ascertained by the jury, deducted from the amount of the plaintiff's claim." The case of Heck v. Shener, 4 Serg. & R. 249, is even stronger. It was there held that in an action to recover compensation for services as a house-keeper, and for goods sold and delivered, evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of malfeasance in the execution of her trust, and embezzled the goods of the defendant, is not admissible by way of set-off; but it may be received under the plea of non-assumpsit, to defeat the action. To the same point are Nickle v. Baldwin, 4 Watts & S. 200; Shoup v. Shoup, 15 Pa. 361; Wright v. Cumpsty, 41 Pa. 102; Hunt v. Gilmore, 59 Pa. 450. This is not only good law, but it is good sense. Surely, if my servant sue me for wages, I may show as a defense to his claim that he has been unfaithful, negligent or dishonest, or that he wasted or embezzled my property. It was urged, however, that the defense was only available as to the portion of the claim for the particular days upon which the negligence and consequential injury occurred. This position cannot be sustained. The plaintiff was suing upon an entire contract. A separate suit could not be maintained for each day's work. Logan v. Caffrey, 80 Pa. 196. The authorities are clear that the defendant was entitled to make defense for his whole loss, and was not limited to defalcate it against the claim for the particular day's work when the loss occurred. Prunall v. Bair, 78 Pa. 403; Blessing v. Miller, 102 Pa. 45.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

A contractor after the completion and delivery of possession of a building and its acceptance by the owner is not liable to a stranger to the contract for injuries resulting from defects in the construction of the building.

(February 16, 1891.)

APPREAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 8, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

If defendant had delivered possession of the hotel to its owner and the latter had accepted it, and if the accident happened while said owner, or its lessee, was in possession, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against the defendant.

NOTE.—Duty is an essential element of negligence.

If there is no duty, there can be no negligence, as duty is an essential element, and such duty must be owed to the plaintiff, or an action will not lie. *Nickerson v. Bridgeport H. Appellant knew that the building he was to erect was to be used as a hotel, and knew that persons without apprehending any danger would pass and repass and occupy the porch in great numbers. It was his duty to construct the porch in such a manner and with such materials, so that it would be held safe and secure, and suitable for the purposes for which it was intended. This duty the appellant owed to the public.

Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387; Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111.

If the appellant has committed only a breach of contract, he is liable to those only with whom he contracted; but, if he has committed a breach of duty, he is not protected by setting up a contract in respect of the same matter with another person.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Philip H. Somerset, entered into a contract with the Sea Isle City Hotel Company for the erection of a hotel building, at Sea Isle City, according to certain plans and specifications. The building was completed, and accepted by the hotel company in the presence of their architect and the chairman of the building committee. Subsequently, at an entertainment given at the hotel by the proprietor or lessee, a crowd of persons, some twenty or more, having collected on the porch, a girder, which in part supported it, gave way, the porch fell and by reason thereof the plaintiff was injured. He brought this suit in the court below against the contractor, to recover damages for the injury he thus sustained, with the result of a verdict in his favor for $4,000. Upon the trial the defendant asked the court below to instruct the jury that "if Somerset, the defendant, was the contractor for the erection of the hotel in question, for the Sea Isle Hotel Company, the owner, and after completion delivered possession of it to the said Sea Isle Hotel Company on June 30, 1888, which company accepted it, and if the accident in question happened after June 30, 1888, and while said owner or his lessee was in possession, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against the defendant." This point was refused, and it fairly presents the important question in the case. The contention of the plaintiff is that the accident was caused by the defective construction of the porch; that it was not according to the plans and specifications called for by the contract; that timber inferior in size and quality to those called for by the plans were used; that these defects were not observable after the building was completed, and, in point of fact, were unknown to the company when it accepted the building from the contractor. We must assume these allegations as substantially found by the jury, and the question arises, What is the responsibility of the contractor under such circumstances? That he would be responsible to the company for any loss sustained by it in consequence of his failure to erect the building in conformity to the plans and specifications may be conceded. There was a contractual relation between them, and for breach of a contract, not known to, and approved by, the company, he would be liable. Is he also liable for injury to a third person, not a party to the contract, sustained by reason of defective construction? It is very clear that he was not responsible by force of any contractual relation, for, as before observed, there was no contract between these parties, and hence there could have been no breach. If liable at all, it can only be for a violation of some duty. It may be stated, as a general proposition, that a man is not responsible for a breach of duty where he owes no duty. What duty did the defendant owe to the plaintiff? The latter was not upon the porch by the invitation of the defendant. The proprietor of the hotel, or whoever invited or procured the presence of the plaintiff there, may be said to have owed him a duty,—the duty of ascertaining that the porch was of sufficient strength to safely hold the guests whom he had invited. The plaintiff contended, however, that, as the hotel company was not responsible, the contractor must necessarily be so. This, however, is moving in a circle. It by no means follows that, because A is not responsible for an accident, B or some other person must be.

Authorities are not abundant upon this point, for the reason that it is comparatively new. I do not know of any direct ruling upon it in this State. The true rule, which we think applicable to it, may be found in Wharton on Negligence, § 489. It is as follows: "There must be causal connection between the negligence and the hurt; and such causal connection is interrupted by the interposition between the negligence and the hurt of any independent human agency. Thus, a contractor is employed by a city to build a bridge in a workmanlike manner, and after he has finished his work, and it has been accepted by the city, a traveler is hurt while passing over it by a defect caused by the contractor's negligence. Now, the contractor may be liable upon his contract to the city for his negligence, but he is not liable to the traveler in an action on the case for damages. The reason sometimes given to sustain such a conclusion is that otherwise there would be no end to suits. But a better ground is that there is no causal connection between the traveler's hurt and the contractor's negligence. The traveler reposed no confidence on the contractor, nor did the contractor accept any confidence from the traveler. The traveler, no doubt, reposed confidence on the city that it would have its bridges and highways in good order; but between the contractor and the traveler intervened the city, an independent, responsible agent, breaking the causal connection." In section 440 the same learned author refers to the case of a contract with the postmaster-general to furnish certain road-worthy carriages; and after the delivery of the carriages the plaintiff is injured in using one of them, by reason of the carriage having been defectively built. "No doubt," says Mr. Wharton, "had the carriage been built for the plaintiff, he could have recovered from the contractor. But there is no confidence exchanged between him and the contractor; and between them, breaking the causal connection, is the postmaster-general, acting independently, forming a distinct legal center of responsibilities and duties." This rule is distinctly recognized in Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 115. There one Atkinson contracted with the postmaster-general to provide a mail-coach to carry the mail-bags over a certain route. The driver was injured while in this service from a hidden defect in the coach. In a suit by him against Atkinson, it was held that he could not recover; Alderson, J., saying: "The contract in this case was made with the postmaster-general; and the case is just the same as if he had come to the defendant, and ordered a carriage, and had handed it at once over to Atkinson. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract; if we go one step beyond that, there is no reason why we should not go fifty." Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 501; Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 508; Coltiss v. Selden, L. R. 3 C. P. 495, and other English cases, recognize the doctrine that in such instances there is no duty owing from the contractor to the public.

As was said by Martin, B., in Francis v. Cockrell, supra: "The law of England looks at proximate liabilities as far as possible and endeavors to confine liabilities to the persons immediately concerned." In Loose v. Oute, 51 N. Y. 494, it was held that the manufacturer and vendor of a steam boiler is only liable to the purchaser for defective materials, or for any want of care and skill in its construction, and if after delivery to and acceptance by the purchaser, and while in use by him, an explosion occurs, in consequence of such defective construction, to the injury of a third person, the latter has no cause of action, because of such injury, against the manufacturer. We do not find that any of the cases cited on behalf of the plaintiff conflict with the above views. In Godley v. Hagerly, 20 Pa. 887, the builder was the owner, and he was properly held responsible for an inherent weakness in the building by which an accident occurred. In Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111, the warehouse was erected under the personal superintendence of the owner, and, having leased it to the government, he was held liable to a person whose goods were destroyed by the fall of the building, in consequence of its insufficiency for the purpose for which it was erected and leased. In Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 897, the court held a dealer in drugs and medicines, who carelessly labels a deadly poison as a harmless medicine, and sends it so labelled into market, to be liable to all persons who, without fault on their parts, are injured by using it. We think this case was correctly decided, but it has no application. The druggist owed a duty to every person to whom he sold a deadly poison to have it properly labelled to avoid accidents. Just here the analogy between his case and the one in hand ceases. The defendant owed no duty to the public, as before stated; his duty was to his employer. We need not pursue the subject further. We regard the weight of authority with the views above indicated. Moreover, they are sustained by the better reason. The consequence of holding the opposite doctrine would be far-reaching. If a contractor who erects a house, who builds a bridge or performs any other work, the manufacturer who constructs a boiler, piece of machinery or a steam-ship, owes a duty to the whole world, that his work or his machine or his steam-ship shall contain no hidden defect, it is difficult to measure the extent of his responsibility, and no prudent man would engage in such occupations upon such conditions. It is safer and wiser to confine such liabilities to the parties immediately concerned. We are of opinion that the defendant's first point should have been affirmed. So, also, his second point, which asked for a binding instruction in his favor.

This disposes of the case, and we should stop here, were it not that we do not wish any conclusion to be deduced from our silence in regard to the portions of the charge referred to in the fourth and fifth assignments. In these portions of the charge the learned judge used very strong expressions in regard to the alleged departure of the contractor from his plans and specifications. When the court characterizes such departure as "gross and almost criminal negligence," and as "glaringly and knowingly" done, "for which he could have no excuse, except the desire to increase his profits," the defendant has not much chance with the jury. Such intense expressions are ill suited to a judicial charge, and may seriously interfere with a calm and impartial consideration of the facts by the jury. More than this, it was assuming the province of the jury, for the facts are for them. Were there nothing else in the case, we would reverse upon these assignments alone. We prefer, however, to place our decision upon a ground which controls the case.

1. A water company is a public corporation exempt from mechanics' liens where it is bound to furnish water at reasonable rates and after twenty years to transfer its works to a municipality at cost with 10 per cent thereon less dividends received if required to do so, and which is protected from competition until it is able to declare an 8 per cent dividend during five years.
2. A mechanics' lien on a public corporation is not authorized by the Act of April 7, 1870, providing for the sale of the property and franchises of a corporation on execution.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Montgomery County striking from the record a mechanics' lien which they were trying to enforce against property of the defendant Water Company. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bickel & Hobson for appellants.

Messrs. Henry C. Boyer and Morgan & Lewis for appellees.

McCellum, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Lower Merion Water Company was incorporated under the Act of April 29, 1874 (Pub. Laws, 98), and its powers, privileges and duties are defined by the 84th section thereof. It is clothed with the right of eminent domain, and it is protected from competition until it "shall have, from its earnings realized and divided among its stockholders, during five years, a dividend equal to 8 per cent per annum upon its capital stock." It is bound to furnish a sufficient quantity of pure water at reasonable rates and the court of common pleas of the proper county may, on the petition of any citizen using the same, make such order in the premises as may seem just and equitable, and enforce its decrees by the usual process. It may, at the expiration of twenty years from its introduction of the water, be required to transfer to the municipality in which it is located its works at their cost with 10 per cent thereon less the dividends it has received. This partial summary of its powers and duties clearly stamps it as a public corporation. It was decided in Foster v. Fowler, 60 Pa. 27, that the structures necessary to the operations of such a company are not subject to a mechanics' lien, and the present case is ruled by it if the Act of April 7, 1870 (Pub. Laws, 58), which allows the personal, real and mixed property, rights and franchises of a corporation to be sold on a writ of fiery facias, does not supersede it. It is contended that the Act referred to has rendered the reasoning on which the decision in Foster v. Fowler, supra, rests, and which is undoubtedly sound, inapplicable, and our sole inquiry is whether this contention is well founded. It should be noted at the outset that the principle of the case cited was distinctly approved in Girard Pt. Storage Co. v. Southwark Foundry Co., 105 Pa. 248, where a mechanics' lien was sustained on the ground that the public was not directly interested in the business of the defendant corporation. In that case it was conceded that if the Girard Point Storage Company was in the nature of a public corporation its works would be protected from the incumbrance of a mechanics' lien. The case was heard in 1884, and this concession is evidence, at least, that it was not then suggested or supposed that the Act of 1870 could have any part in the decision of it, nor can we now see how that Act affects the claim of the appellants to a lien for their work and materials. The only execution process allowed for the enforcement of a mechanics' lien is a writ of levari facias to sell the building and curtilage bound by it, and the form of the writ is prescribed by the Statute which gives the lien. The levy and sale on the writ of fiery facias allowed by the Act of 1870 may embrace the property, franchises and rights of the corporation in any and every county of the Commonwealth and pass the title thereto as effectually as if "said property, franchises and rights were located, used, levied upon and sold in the county wherein said writ of execution was issued." It is obvious that such comprehensive process was not designed for the collection of a judgment founded on a mechanics' lien. This lien is statutory and in the procedure for its enforcement the judgment and execution are restricted to the property bound by it. It is the policy of the law to keep intact the property belonging to and essential to the operations of a public corporation, and hence its creditors will not be permitted to divide such property and sell a part of it. It would be a signal abandonment of this policy, and it would invite a division of the property to allow it to be sold on mechanics' lien process. This could not be done prior to the Act of 1870, and we discover nothing in that which authorizes it. The fiery facias allowed by that Act is not a substitute for the ordinary fi. fa. under the 72d section of the Act of June 16, 1836, but it is in lieu of sequestration under the 73d section of it. The process and procedure provided by the 72d section remain, and the process provided by the 73d section is superseded by the special fi. fa. given by the Act of 1870. The condition precedent to sequestration was an ordinary fi. fa. returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, and this must precede the writ which takes its place. By this precedent return on the ordinary fi. fa. the insolvency of the corporation is discovered, and the necessity of recourse to a sale for the benefit of its creditors, of its franchises and property essential to its operation, is demonstrated. It was decided in Bayard's App., 72 Pa. 458, that a sale on the fi. fa. given in lieu of sequestration did not change the rule of distributions, but that its proceeds were for the benefit of all its creditors, and on the footing of moneys made by a sequestrator under the Act of 1836. The proceeds of a sale of real and personal property under the 72d section of that Act were applicable to the liens in their order.

The view that we have taken of the Act of 1870, and its effect upon the established practice in the appropriation of the property of a corporation to the payment of its debts, is sustained in an opinion by our Brother Mitchell in Flagg v. Farnsworth, 12 W. N. C. 500, and adopted by Judge McDermott in Bank v. Mfg. Co., 18 W. N. C. 174. These were common pleas discussions, but the reasoning which supports them is clear, satisfactory and, in our opinion, fully vindicated the judgments. While the precise question has not heretofore arisen in this court it is plain that this was the view entertained by Chief Justice Thompson, in Philadelphia & B. C. R. Co's App., 70 Pa. 355, and by Justice Williams in Bayard's App., supra. As the property described in the claim in this case is essential to the operations and is part of the works of the corporation, Foster v. Fowler, supra, sustains the action of the court in striking off the lien.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

UNION COAL CO., Pff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF LA SALLE.

(....ILL.....)

1. A question not raised by the pleadings as to the power of a city to sell coal under its streets cannot be raised for adjudication by stipulation of the parties in an action by the city for trespass in removing such coal where no contract has been in fact made or attempted before the suit, although the stipulation authorizes a settlement of the rights of the parties on the basis of a contract providing the court will uphold the power of the city to make it.
2. The right of the court to decide upon its merits the issue presented by the pleadings cannot be affected by a stipulation between the parties as to matters not covered by the pleadings and which attempts to present a question which the court ignores because not properly before it.
3. A city having the legal title to its streets in trust for the public can maintain trespass for the removal of coal underlying the streets, and recover the full value of the coal, although no actual damage has been done to the surface of the streets.

(January 22, 1891.)

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Second District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for La Salle County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages from defendant for mining and taking away coal from beneath the streets and public squares of plaintiff City. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan & Gilbert for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. D. McDonald and F. J. O'Brien for defendant in error.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Some controversy arises in this case as to the precise questions presented by the record to the trial court for its adjudication, and, consequently, as to the precise questions presented to this court for its decision by the appeal. The issue made by the pleadings is that of a trespass committed by the defendant by entering upon certain strata of coal underlying the public streets of the City of La Salle, and taking therefrom large quantities of coal, and converting the same to its own use. This is the entire scope of the case made by the declaration and plea, and the only judgment which the trial court thereby obtained jurisdiction to pronounce was that of guilty or not guilty of the trespass thus alleged. The stipulation of the parties as to the facts admits that the territory embraced within the City of La Salle was formerly owned by the State, it being a portion of the lands donated by the United States to aid in the construction of the Illinois & Michigan Canal; that in 1838 the trustees of said canal, by virtue of the authority conferred upon them by law, platted and laid off said territory into lots, blocks, streets, alleys and public squares; that underlying said streets, alleys and public squares are several veins of coal, said coal being beneath strata of solid rock several hundred feet in thickness, so that it can be mined without injury to said streets, and without impairing their usefulness as public highways; that said canal trustees conveyed to sundry persons all the lots and blocks so platted by them, and that the defendant owns, by purchase from the various owners, all the coal underlying the lots and blocks in the portion of said City in question in this suit, and is desirous, in connection therewith, of obtaining, by purchase or otherwise, the right to mine the coal underlying said streets and alleys; that said City is willing to sell said coal, and the right to mine it, at a certain price, but that a controversy exists as to the right of said City to sell and dispose of said coal; that the defendant has, without permission, mined and removed coal from beneath the streets of said City to the amount, in value, of $1,050; that the parties have agreed that, in case the City has the right to sell said coal, the reasonable damage for the coal mined by the defendant is $50 per acre for the coal actually mined, and, in case the City has the right to sell said coal, it is willing to sell for a like sum per acre all the coal not mined underlying all the streets, alleys and public squares of said City west of Joliet Street; that, in case it shall be determined by the final adjudication of the courts of this State that said City has a legal right to sell and dispose of the coal underlying its streets, alleys and public squares, a judgment shall be rendered against the defendant for the value of the coal thus mined computed at the rate aforesaid, but that, if it shall be finally decided by said courts that said City has no right to sell and dispose of said coal, judgment shall be entered in this case in favor of the defendant, "the City not desiring, but expressly waiving all right, to recover merely nominal damages for the mining of said coal, or any damage whatever, in case it has no legal right to sell said coal;" that the question both parties desire to have determined is as to the right of the City to sell and dispose of the coal aforesaid at its market value, it being conceded that no actual damage has been done to the surface of the streets, or their use for public purposes, or will be occasioned to them by mining said coal.

The contention is that under this stipulation a question not raised by the pleadings, and in respect to which there is no present controversy between the parties, viz., whether the City has the legal right or power to sell to the defendant the remaining coal underlying its streets, alleys and public squares, and license the defendant to mine and remove the same, is presented for adjudication, and that the court, before it could properly render a judgment of guilty against the defendant for the alleged trespass, was obliged to pass upon that question, and hold that such right to sell and license existed. It is manifest that the question thus sought to be raised was purely speculative, the effort being to obtain in advance the opinion of the court as to the validity of a contemplated contract before it is entered into, or any rights in relation to it have accrued to either party, they thus seeking, in effect, to employ the court as their legal adviser in a matter about which they intend to negotiate. It is not the province of the courts to pronounce opinions or to give advice upon questions which are merely speculative. Judicial investigation, ordinarily at least, should be limited to rights which have actually accrued; and all attempts to obtain from the courts decisions in relation to rights which have not yet accrued, or to the validity of transactions which have not yet been entered into, ought to, and usually do, prove abortive.

Under the pleadings, the right of the plaintiff to recover depended solely upon whether the evidence presented at the trial established the defendant's guilt of the trespass alleged, and it was not within the power of the parties to so change the established order of legal proceedings as to make such right depend upon the opinion the court might form as to the validity or invalidity of a contract in relation to another subject matter which the parties were seeking to negotiate. Nor does it seem to be material that some of the legal principles involved in such proposed contract may have had a collateral bearing upon the issue presented by the pleadings. It is sufficient to say that the validity of such contract was not in issue, and was not, and could not be, submitted to the court for its decision in the manner here attempted. The court was therefore entirely at liberty to disregard the stipulation, so far as it attempted to obtain a decision of a matter not properly before it. If it had attempted to decide that question, there was no legal mode by which it could embody such decision in its judgment; and its opinion in relation to it, if it had seen proper to pronounce one, would have been a mere obiter dictum. But if it should be conceded that the portion of the stipulation which calls for the decision of a question not at issue was in all respects valid and binding, both upon the parties and the court, it cannot be doubted, we think, that it should receive a strict construction, or at least a construction which would confine its operation to the cases specifically provided for. Its terms are that, in case it is decided that the City has a legal right to sell and dispose of the coal underlying its streets, alleys and public squares, the judgment should be for the plaintiff for the value of the coal already mined; but that, if the decision should be that the City has no such right, judgment should be entered for the defendant. There is no stipulation, however, as to what judgment should be entered in case the court declined to pass on that question at all. As to that possible, and indeed very probable, outcome of the litigation, the stipulation was silent. There was no provision that in that event the suit should be dismissed, or that judgment should go for or against either party. It follows that the court, by declining to pass upon the question thus sought to be submitted, was left entirely at liberty to decide the issue presented by the pleadings upon the merits, wholly untrammelled by any of the requirements of the stipulation.

It remains to be seen whether, under the facts established by the stipulation of the parties, the court properly found the defendant guilty. Where the ultimate facts upon which the right to recover depends are admitted, as they are here, the right to recover becomes a question of law; and whether that question was properly decided by the trial court is therefore open for consideration here. By our Statute the acknowledgment and recording of a plat by the owner of lands within a city, by which such lands are subdivided and platted into blocks, lots, streets, alleys, public squares, etc., is declared to operate, both at law and in equity, as a conveyance in fee by the owner to the city of such portions of the lands platted as are embraced within the streets, alleys and other grounds dedicated to the use of the public; and it is provided that the lands embraced within such streets, alleys and other public places shall be held by the city, in its corporate name, in trust for the uses and purposes set forth and intended by the plat. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 109, § 8; Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 115; Rev. Laws 1893, p. 699.

It results from these provisions of the Statute that the legal title to the streets and alleys in question in this suit is vested in the City of La Salle in trust for the use of the public for the purposes of streets and alleys. Illinois & M. Canal Trustees v. Haven, 11 Ill. 554; Manly v. Gibson, 18 Ill. 808; Hunter v. Middleton, Id. 50; Chicago v. McGinn, 51 Ill. 266; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 437; Gebhardt v. Reeves, 75 Ill. 801; Chicago v. Rumsey, 87 Ill. 348; Brooklyn v. Smith, 104 Ill. 429. The trust thus vested in the City is not a mere dry or passive trust, but one in the execution of which the City has and holds the possession, control, management and supervision of the trust property. This management, supervision and control of streets and alleys is expressly vested in the municipal authorities by statute. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 24, § 62.

It is the duty of a trustee to defend and protect the title to the trust estate; and, as the legal title is in him, he alone can sue and be sued in a court of law. Upon this principle, it is held that a trustee may maintain an action for any trespass upon the land held by him in trust. Walker v. Fawcett, 7 Ired. L. 44; 1 Perry, Tr. § 828.

That the entry by the defendant upon the strata of coal underlying the streets of La Salle, and mining coal therefrom, was a trespass, cannot admit of doubt. The defendant had no more right to mine the coal under said streets than it would have had to enter upon the lands of any other proprietor, and mine coal therefrom. The owners of lots abutting upon the streets of a city have no title to the fee in the streets, their interest being limited to a mere easement, viz., the right of using the streets for purposes of ingress and egress to and from their lots, and for the ordinary purposes of travel. Their sale to the defendant of the coal underlying their lots gave to it no greater rights than they themselves had, and therefore vested in the defendant no title or license to mine beyond the street line. Mining beyond that was a trespass, for which the defendant is clearly liable to an action. In whom is the right of action to recover damages for such trespass vested? Clearly, not in the owners of the abutting property. Hunter v. Middleton, supra. The City, the owner of the fee in the streets, is the party, and the only party, authorized to sue; and in such suit it is entitled to recover, not merely nominal damages, but full compensation for the injury done to its freehold.

The conclusion we have reached is supported by the decisions of other States where, as here, the legal title to the land covered by the streets is vested in the municipality. Thus, in Des Moines v. Hall, 24 Iowa, 284, it was held that under the Statute of Iowa the laying off and recording of a town plat or an addition thereto had the effect of vesting in the municipal corporation the fee-simple title and exclusive right of dominion over the streets and alleys dedicated to the public use, and that neither the original proprietor nor his grantee had the right to the subterraneous deposits of coal within the limits of such streets, and that the corporation might maintain an action against such proprietor for the coal mined and taken beneath the same. In Hawesville v. Hawes, 6 Bush, 282, it was held that where the absolute title to streets, and not merely an easement over them, is vested in the municipal authorities, such authorities own the coal under the surface of the streets; and the lessees of the heirs of the original owners of certain land over which such streets had been platted having mined and removed the coal under such streets, and paid to said heirs a certain rental therefor, it was held that the municipal authorities might waive the tort committed by the removal of said coal without their consent, and sue and recover from said heirs the rental so received by them as money had and received. We are satisfied, both upon reason and authority, that the plaintiff in this case was entitled to maintain its action of trespass against the defendant, and to recover as damages the full value of the coal actually mined.

The judgment will be affirmed.

REPUBLIC LIFE INSURANCE CO., Appt.,

v.

Charles P. SWIGERT, Auditor of Public Accounts, et al.

(....Ill....)

1. A statute empowering the state auditor to institute proceedings for the dissolution of insurance companies which upon examination seem to be insolvent, or in such condition as to render their further continuance in business hazardous to the insured or to the public, and to apply for an injunction to prevent their further proceeding with the business, and for a receiver, is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts.

2. An order will be treated as a part of the record and legitimately before the court for examination on the rehearing of an appeal, if the case was submitted by both parties at the first hearing, upon the theory that the order was properly in the record.

3. In a statutory proceeding by the state auditor to wind up a corporation, to which the stockholders are not made parties, the corporation has the duty to protect their rights, and it may therefore object to the making of an order directing the receiver to bring suits for unpaid stock subscriptions.

4. A corporation may, if it acts in good faith, lawfully receive from its subscribers, who have paid a certain percentage of their subscriptions, a surrender of the certificates held by them, and issue, in lieu thereof, certificates for as many fully paid shares of stock as the money paid in will buy, thereby releasing them from further liability so far as the claims of the company itself are concerned.

5. Error may be assigned upon an interlocutory order which is continued in force by the final decree, and involves and determines a matter of substantial right.

6. A receiver appointed in a statutory proceeding instituted by the state auditor, to wind up an insolvent insurance company, has no authority to sue for unpaid stock subscriptions which the company has released by a contract binding on itself, either by the terms of the statute or by the order of appointment, or by an assignment to him by the company of its effects, made in pursuance of such order. Such receiver does not represent the rights of creditors.

7. An order for the payment of a dividend to creditors, made during the course of proceedings for the winding up of an insolvent insurance company, to which no objection was taken until a rehearing had been granted of an appeal from the final decree in the case, and upon which the receiver has acted and had his report confirmed, will not be disturbed.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th of May, 1877, the State Auditor filed his petition in the Circuit Court of Cook County against the Republic Life Insurance Company, under the provision of the Act in regard to the dissolution of insurance companies, approved February 17, 1874. The Auditor alleged in his petition that he had caused an examination to be made of the assets and liabilities of the Company, and that, from such examination, he was of the opinion that the condition of the Company was such as to render its further continuance in business hazardous to the insured therein. The prayer of the petition was that the Company might be enjoined and restrained from further proceeding with its insurance business, and that a receiver might be appointed to take charge of the real estate and effects of the Company, in pursuance of the Act aforesaid, and with the power therein prescribed, and usually vested in a receiver. On the same day that the petition was filed, the Company waived service of process, and entered its appearance, and filed an answer, which was as follows: "Now comes the said defendant, by its solicitor, and saith that it cannot deny the matters in said bill alleged, and it prays to be hence dismissed," etc. Thereupon, and on the same day, on motion of the solicitors for the Auditor, and no objection being made by the Company, Samuel D. Ward was appointed receiver. It was also ordered that the Company, its officers, agents, attorneys and servants, be enjoined and restrained, until the further order of the court from further proceeding with its business, or from any transfer of the property other than to the receiver, and from receiving or paying out any moneys; and that neither the receiver, nor the defendant, nor its officers, agents, servants or attorneys, should exact or take from its policy-holders any sum or sums of money to accrue from the premiums on policies beyond what might be justly due or payable on or as of the 25th day of May, 1877. It was specified in the order appointing the receiver that said Samuel D. Ward "be, and is hereby, appointed receiver of all and singular the real estate, personality, choses in action, bonds, bills, notes, securities, evidences of indebtedness, books, records, moneys, checks, drafts and property and assets of every nature, real and personal, of and belonging to said defendant, or in any manner held in trust for or subject to the control of said defendant, as the same are on this 25th day of May, with power to take possession of the same forthwith, and to institute any and all necessary proceedings or actions to recover the same, either at law or in equity." And it was further ordered that the president and secretary of the Company should forthwith execute and deliver to the receiver all necessary deeds, conveyances and assurances of title, proper and requisite to carry out the foregoing order, and to vest in the receiver full title to all and singular the properties, assets and choses in action of the defendant; and that said receiver should have and exercise all and singular the rights and powers conferred upon such receiver by the statutes of this State in that behalf; and that he should have the usual powers of a receiver in equity, with liberty to apply to the court, from time to time, for such further directions and orders as might be necessary to the discharge of his trust. In conformity with this order and decree, the officers of the Company made to the receiver deeds for all the real estate of the Company, and on May 27, 1877, the president and secretary executed and delivered to him an assignment of all the property of the Company, and immediately turned over to him such property. On December 1, 1877, the receiver presented to the court a petition in which it was stated that at a meeting of the stockholders of the Republic Life Insurance Company held on the 11th day of June, 1878, the following resolutions were adopted, to wit: "Resolved, that the board of directors of this Company be, and the same is hereby, instructed and empowered to receive from such of the stockholders as may desire and to cancel all outstanding certificates of the stock of this Company upon which but 20 per cent has been paid, and to issue, in place thereof, a new certificate to each stockholder for the number of shares at par represented by the 20 per cent already paid, or secured to be paid, by such stockholder or stockholders. Resolved, that the remainder of the stock of this Company be held as unsold stock, subject to sale and issue as the directors shall deem best, but at par and for cash only, exclusive of expense and commissions."

It further appeared from said petition that, in pursuance of said resolutions, a large number of the subscribers to the stock of said Company surrendered their certificates of stock upon which but 20 per cent had been paid, and received in lieu thereof certificates for one fifth the number of shares of stock so surrendered, which said new certificates represented the holders thereof as entitled to the number of shares of full-paid stock therein respectively specified. It also appeared from the petition that the largest proportion of the liabilities of the Company were contracted before the said 11th day of June, 1878, when, by vote of the stockholders, the directors were authorized to issue full-paid certificates of stock on the surrender of the certificates on which only 20 per cent had been paid. The petition stated: "Your petitioner knows of no resources out of which he will be able to realize any money to pay the balance of the liabilities of said Company over and above 20 or 25 per cent thereof, unless the same can be collected of said stockholders and subscribers to said stock." The prayer of the petition was for the direction of the court in the premises, and for such other and further order in reference to the matter of commencing proceedings against said subscribers and stockholders as shall seem just and proper.

On January 31, 1878, an order was entered in said cause, which was as follows, to wit: "Samuel D. Ward, receiver of said defendant, having heretofore—to wit, on 1st day of December, A. D. 1877—filed his petition herein asking for the direction of the court in reference to further legal proceedings against the subscribers to the stock and stockholders of said defendant, and it appearing to the court that said receiver has published a notice, etc., that the application contained in said petition would be heard on this day, etc., and said application now coming on to be heard, after argument by counsel for said receiver and for said complainant, and the court being advised in the premises, it is ordered by the court that the said receiver be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to institute such legal or equitable proceedings as he may be advised are necessary and proper against the subscribers to the stock and stockholders of said defendant, or against such of them as he may be advised are or may be indebted to the said Company; and that he institute such proceedings against resident and nonresident subscribers to stock and stockholders, or either of them, and proceed with all convenient speed with the same, for the purpose of collecting a sufficient amount to pay the debts and liabilities of said defendant." On the 22d day of June, 1881, the cause came on for a hearing in the circuit court, and the court rendered a final decree therein, overruling the prayer of the Company in its answer to be dismissed out of court, and decreeing that the Company be perpetually enjoined, restrained and prohibited from the further prosecution of its business, and that the previous appointment of Ward as receiver be ratified and confirmed. Thereafter a writ of error was sued out of this court by the Republic Life Insurance Company. The errors assigned upon the amended record which was filed in this court were that the court erred in not dismissing the petition of the Auditor as prayed for in the answer of the plaintiff in error; and that the court erred in making each and every of the orders and decrees set forth in the record aforesaid. In the briefs and arguments which were filed on behalf of the plaintiff in error prior to the rehearing, the grounds of objection urged to the decree and orders of the court were that the allegations of the petition filed by the Auditor were not sufficient to sustain the final decree, and that it was therefore erroneous; that the law authorizing the appointment of a receiver, and the dissolution and winding up of the Company and its affairs, was violative of the contract clauses of both the Federal and State Constitutions, and the Act therefore void, and the decree erroneous; and that, even assuming the Act to be valid, and the allegations of the petition to be sufficient, the court had no power, on the application of the receiver, to authorize him to call in question the surrender of subscriptions to capital stock, and the receipt of paid-up stock for the money paid on such subscriptions, as being in fraud of the rights of creditors; and that such transaction could be impeached only by and on the application of creditors of the Company.

Section 1 of the Act of 1874, now under consideration, provides "that if the auditor of state, upon examination of any insurance company incorporated in this State, is of the opinion that it is insolvent, or that its condition is such as to render its further continuance in business hazardous to the insured therein, or to the public, . . . he shall apply by petition to a judge of any circuit court of this State to issue an injunction restraining such company, in whole or in part, from further proceeding with its business until a full hearing can be had, or otherwise, as the court may direct." Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 73, § 103. The further clause of this section provides that the court "may in all such cases make such orders and decrees, from time to time, as the exigencies and equities of the case may require, and in any case, after a full hearing of all parties interested, may dissolve, modify or perpetuate such injunction, and make all such orders and decrees as may be needful to suspend, restrain or prohibit the further continuance of the business of the Company." Section 5 of the Act provides for the appointment by the court of one or more receivers, "to take charge of the estate and effects of the Company, including such securities as may be deposited with the auditor or treasurer of state, and to collect the debts due and property belonging to it, with power to prosecute and defend suits in the name of the corporation, or in their own names, to appoint agents under them, and do all other acts necessary for the collection, marshaling and distributing of the assets of the company, and the closing of its concerns." Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 73, § 107.

The petition which was filed by the Auditor in this cause contained all the averments that section 1 of the Act requires to enable the court to grant an injunction, and to appoint a receiver. The allegations of the petition conferred jurisdiction to render a decree appointing a receiver, and perpetually enjoining the further prosecution of the business of the corporation, and decreeing its involuntary dissolution, and especially so since the Company answered that it could not deny the matters alleged in the petition. The constitutional question which is argued by counsel was fully considered by this court in Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 598. It was there held that the Statute now under consideration was constitutional. It is not necessary to again state the reasons which led to that conclusion.

Was the order which was entered by the court on the 31st day of January, 1878, directing the receiver to institute proceedings against stockholders, erroneous?

Preliminary to giving attention to this question, there are several matters which may properly be examined. It is urged that said order of January 31, 1878, is not in the record, except as a matter of evidence. The record consists of the record which was originally filed in this court and of an additional or supplemental record which was afterwards filed. This latter record contains the pleadings and the orders and proceedings in the cause. It is informally made up, and after the statement that "petitioner, in support of his motion for a perpetual injunction, introduced on the hearing the following evidence," follow the various petitions, answers, proceedings and orders in the cause. The certificate of the clerk is that the transcript is a true, perfect and complete transcript of the record, prepared in accordance with the stipulation of counsel, contained in the record. The stipulation was filed in the cause, and immediately precedes the certificate of the clerk, and it is, in substance, that the record first filed in this court, "together with the foregoing record, as made up for said supreme court, . . . shall be taken as the complete record in said cause, for the purposes of this suit." There is also indorsed upon said record a stipulation, signed by the solicitors for the defendants in error, that the errors assigned upon the record originally filed may be considered as assigned and made upon said amended record; and one of the errors so assigned is that "the court erred in making each and every of the orders and decrees set forth in the record aforesaid." It would seem that the transcript was made up for this court in the way in which it was by consent of counsel for both parties, and probably for the purpose of avoiding the supposed necessity of copying the pleadings, proceedings and orders twice in the record, and at the same time showing that the same were given in evidence in support of the motion for a perpetual injunction. Upon the first hearing of this cause in this court, it was submitted by both parties to the controversy upon the theory that the order in question was properly in the record, and before the court for review. The case was heard and determined upon that assumption. We must now regard that order as a part of the record, and as legitimately before us for examination.

It is suggested that it is for the interest and benefit of the corporation that a sufficient amount should be collected from its stockholders to pay its debts, and that it cannot be heard to complain of the order directing suits to be brought against such stockholders. In Ward v. Farwell, supra, it was held that, on a petition filed by the auditor to dissolve an insurance company, or to restrain its further transaction of business, the stockholders of such corporation were not necessary parties to the proceeding. It would seem, then, that in any matter which affects the rights or interests of the stockholders the company must, from the very nature of the case, have the right to protect its stockholders, and that it is its duty so to do. A contrary conclusion would be subversive of justice, and in antagonism with first principles.

It is claimed that the order of the court now under investigation does not direct the receiver to proceed, either at law or in equity, against stock subscribers or stockholders, whether they have surrendered their certificates of partly-paid stock or not. It must be conceded that it does not in express terms direct or authorize such suits; but, in order to apprehend the full scope of the order, it is necessary to take into consideration one or two matters which we have not thus far stated. Section 6 of the charter of plaintiff in error provides as follows: "The real and personal property of each individual stockholder shall be held liable for any and all liabilities of the Company, to the amount of stock held or subscribed by him, and not actually paid in. In all cases of losses not exceeding the means of the corporation, each stockholder shall be liable to the amount of unpaid stock held by him." A corporation may, if it acts in good faith, buy and sell shares of its own stock. Chicago, P. & S. W. R. Co. v. Marseilles, 84 Ill. 145, 648; Chelatin v. Republic L. Ins. Co. 86 Ill. 220; Olapp v. Peterson, 104 Ill. 26.

The surrender by stockholders to the Company of the certificates of stock upon which 20 per cent had been paid, and the issuance to such stockholders of certificates for paid-up stock, was, in substance, and in legal effect, a purchase by the Company of the unpaid stock at its par value. The transaction was not ultra vires. It was based upon resolutions adopted by the corporation at a stockholders' meeting. It does not appear that any stockholder has ever objected either to the resolutions or to the transfers of stock which, in conformity therewith, took place between the corporation and such of the stockholders as elected to avail themselves of the privilege given thereby. The contracts were valid as between the Company and the stockholders who gave up their part-paid stock, and received, in lieu thereof, full-paid stock for one fifth of the amount relinquished. The transaction was binding upon the Company, and the stockholders who sold their stock to the corporation should be protected against further payments upon their subscriptions, unless there were at the time of such transaction existing creditors in respect to whose rights it was fraudulent. It is to be noted that thereafter, as between such stockholders and the Company, there was no indebtedness to the Company in regard to the subscriptions for stock. Such being the law, and the condition of affairs being such as has already been sufficiently indicated herein, the circuit court made the order of January 31, 1878, authorizing and directing the receiver to institute legal or equitable proceedings, not only against such of the subscribers to the stock and stockholders as he should be advised "are or may be indebted to the said Company," but also "against the subscribers to the stock and stockholders of said defendant." The language of the order is broad enough to cover suits prosecuted upon the liability of the stockholders to the creditors, and where the only liability is to the creditors. Construing the order in the light of the petition of the receiver upon which it was based, the purpose of it was clearly to authorize and direct the receiver to sue for and recover from the stockholders subscriptions for stock which they had, under the resolutions of the 11th of June, 1878, surrendered to the Company. We think, therefore, that the grounds which are urged by plaintiff in error for the reversal of that order clearly appear upon the face of the order, when properly construed.

It is suggested that the order in question is merely an interlocutory order and that error 12 L. R. A.

cannot be assigned thereon. But that order is still in force by virtue of the final decree, and it involves and determines a matter of substantial right; and we understand that, under such circumstances, error may be assigned upon an interlocutory order.

If the order directing proceedings against the stockholders who had transferred their unpaid stock to the corporation was valid, and was not erroneous, it seems it must necessarily be so either because the assignment made by the Company to the receiver invested the latter with such title, right or power as would enable him to maintain such suit, or because a receiver has authority, under the rule which prevails in the chancery courts, to avoid the voluntary and lawful acts of the person or corporation whose estate he represents, or may be clothed with such power by the court of chancery which appointed him, or because the Statute for the dissolution of insurance companies makes the receiver appointed, in conformity with its provisions, the representative of the creditors of the Company that is restrained from the further prosecution of its business.

We will first consider the matter of the deed of assignment. It has been suggested that the transfer of the unpaid stock to the Company did not operate as an absolute discharge of the stockholders' indebtedness for such stock, but was a discharge sub modo only; that the debts continued to exist just as they did before, for the purpose of liquidating the claims of the creditors; that the Company continued to be the creditor, and the subscribing stockholders the debtors, so far as the creditors of the Company are concerned; and that, the legal title and interest in the debts remaining in the Company for the benefits of its creditors, such legal title and interest, and the right of the Company to control the claims, passed to the receiver by virtue of the Company's assignment to him, in pursuance of the order of the court directing such assignment. The statement of this theory is qualified by the expression, "for the benefit of the creditors," and other expressions of like import. It is to be borne in mind that there are no creditors who were parties to the proceeding the record of which is now before us. The statement also includes the element of "the right of the Company to control the claims." But the transaction in question was lawful and valid so far as the Company itself was concerned, and was binding upon it, and it had no right to impeach it (only the creditors were entitled to the privilege), and the Company had no authority to enforce or "control" the claims, and it could not pass by its deed of assignment to anyone, either assignee or receiver, any right of control or enforcement that it did not of itself have. It would seem that the Company, by its deed of assignment to the receiver, did not transfer to him any rights greater or in addition to those that would have been conveyed had the assignment been made to an assignee under the Voluntary Assignment Law. The provisions of the assignment now under investigation are no broader or more comprehensive than those that would have been contained in a deed made to such assignee; and, even if they were, it would be immaterial, for, in the nature of things, one cannot transfer to another a right which he does not have, unless he is acting under a power.

In the case of Bouton v. Dement, 123 Ill. 142, 11 West. Rep. 487, this court, speaking of an assignment under the Act relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, said: "The company, by its assignment, conveyed no greater right in respect to its property than the company itself possessed. It is a rule of extensive prevalence that a general assignment for the benefit of creditors does not pass to the assignee any interest in property before fraudulently transferred by the assignor, nor any right to impeach or set aside such fraudulent transfer, such right belonging to the creditors only. . . . As held by this court, an administrator cannot, even for the benefit of creditors, avoid a fraudulent conveyance made by his intestate. . . . We think consistency with our decision with respect to administrators requires the adoption of the rule above stated. It would seem, upon principle, that the same rule in this respect which exists in regard to an administrator should be held to apply to an assignee under a voluntary assignment. We do not perceive that our Statute respecting assignments makes any change of the rule. The assignee under the above doctrine is not the representative of creditors, but the agent of the assignor for the distribution of the property assigned. The assignee's duty . . . is confined to the distribution of the property assigned to him. Any interest in property before fraudulently transferred by the assignor was not assigned to the assignee."

In the cases passed upon by this court in respect to an administrator, and in respect to an assignee under the Assignment Act, there were the same elements that were claimed here, at least so far as the assignment made by the company is concerned. These elements are the existence of creditors at the time of the transfers of property, and in respect to which creditors such transfers were, or were claimed to be, fraudulent, and a subsequent vesting in another person, either by operation of law or by conveyance of the property rights of the party who has made the supposed fraudulent transfers, and an attempt by such person to enforce the right of creditors to reach, in payment of their debts, the property fraudulently transferred by the person to whose property rights the person making such attempt has succeeded. And there was the same element lacking that is lacking here, i. e., the right sought to be enforced had not been vested in the person from whom title and interest were derived. We think that consistency with this decision in Bouton v. Dement, in regard to an assignee under a voluntary assignment, as well as consistency with the decision of the court in regard to an administrator, requires that the same rule should be adopted in this case in respect to the effect of the assignment that was executed by the plaintiff in error to the receiver. In other words, the receiver took by the assignment made by plaintiff in error no right to control or enforce the claims against the stockholders growing out of the transaction between the Company and some of the stockholders whereby certificates of stock were surrendered to the Company in payment of unpaid subscriptions to capital stock.

The only authority to impeach the sale of the stock to the Company being in the creditors of the corporation, the receiver, Ward, if he has such authority, must have it either because the doctrine applicable to proceedings in chancery invests him with an agency and right to act on behalf of the creditors in that regard, or gives the court of equity, by virtue of its inherent powers, the prerogative to so invest him, or upon the ground that the Statute for the dissolution of insurance companies clothes him with the right to enforce the rights of the creditors in that behalf. We understand the rule to be that, where a receiver is appointed for the purpose of taking charge of the property and assets of a corporation, he is, for the purpose of determining the nature and extent of his title, regarded as representing only the corporate body itself, and not its creditors or shareholders, being vested by law with the estate of the corporation, and deriving his own title under and through it; and that, for purposes of litigation, he takes only the rights of the corporation, such as could be asserted in its own name; and that upon that basis only can he litigate for the benefit of either stockholders or creditors. In High on Receivers (§ 315) the rule is formulated substantially and almost in words as stated above, except that the rule is qualified in said section by the statement that when acts have been done in fraud of the rights of creditors, but which are valid as against the corporation itself, the receiver holds adversely to the corporation. The only authority cited as sustaining the qualification found in the text is the case of Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 44. That case was decided upon the basis of such qualification. It was assumed and conceded by counsel upon the argument of the case that the receiver succeeded to the rights of the creditors. It was announced in the opinion of the court that, "for all the purposes of the present controversy," they would "proceed upon this assumption." The receivership there in question was constituted under the statutory provisions in which were found the expressions: "Appoint one or more receivers to take charge of the property and effects of the corporation;" "the property that may belong to it;" "are vested with all the estate, real and personal, of such corporation;" "as trustees for the benefit of creditors and stockholders;" "deemed vested with all the real and personal estate of the debtor;" and "power to sue in their own name or otherwise and recover all the estate, debts and things in action belonging or due to such debtor, in the same manner and with the like effect as such debtor might or could have done if no attachment had been issued or trustees appointed." Comstock, J., in his opinion said: "It has been said in this, as in other cases, that the receiver represents the creditors and the stockholders, but, for all the purposes of inquiry into his title, he really represents the corporation. He is by law vested with the estate of the corporate body, and takes his title under and through it. It is true, indeed, that he is declared to be a trustee for creditors and stockholders, but this only proves that they are the beneficiaries of the fund in his hands, without indicating the sources of his title, or the extent of his powers. If, then, in a con-trovercy between the receiver and third parties in respect to the corporate estate, it is possible to form a conception of rights, legal or equitable, belonging to the shareholders as individuals, which the corporation itself could not assert in its own name, the receiver does not represent those rights. So far as the shareholders are concerned, he can litigate respecting the fund upon precisely the grounds which would be available to the corporation, if it were still in existence, solvent and no receivership had been constituted. In regard to creditors, I should certainly incline to take the same view of his rights and powers under the statutes referred to."

In Alexander v. Relfs, 74 Mo. 495, it was said in the opinion of the court: "When acts have been done in fraud of the rights of creditors, the receiver may litigate for their benefit, though the acts in question be valid as to the corporation itself, in which case he holds adversely to the corporation." This language was wholly unnecessary to the decision of the case, and the only authority cited therefor was High, Receivers, § 815, and cases cited, which we have mentioned and considered above.

In Hyde v. Lynde, 2 N. Y. 887, it was said by Bronson, Ch. J.: "The recovery in this case seems to have gone upon the ground that the receiver had greater rights than those which belonged to the company. But for most, if not for all, purposes, he took the place, and stands as the representative, of the company. He is as much bound by a settlement which the company was authorized to make as was the company itself. It would be strange, indeed, if the legal acts of a corporation did not bind the receiver of its effects. . . . If the settlement, though a lawful act in itself, had been made for an illegal purpose; if, for example, the parties had known that there were valid claims against the company to the payment of which the defendant ought to contribute, and yet the note was given up without consideration, for the purpose of defrauding either the creditors or the other members of the corporation,—the persons defrauded would undoubtedly have a remedy. But I do not see how the receiver could sue. It would be like the case of a conveyance of property for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the grantor, which, though void as against the persons intended to be defrauded, is nevertheless valid against the grantor, and all who represent him. A receiver of the effects of such a grantor could not avoid the grant. Neither can this receiver avoid a settlement which bound the corporation, though, in the supposed case, it was a fraud upon the creditors, and other members of the company. The person injured must sue."

In Farnworth v. Wood, 91 N. Y. 808, the court said: "The rights of certain creditors to prosecute their claims against certain of the stockholders never were the property of the corporation, nor rights of action vested in it, nor is there any provision of the Statute which transfers their rights of action from the creditors to the receiver."

In Coops v. Bowles, 42 Barb. 87, it was held that a receiver is not clothed with any right to maintain an action which the parties or the estate which he represents could not maintain; 13 L. R. A.

and that he must show a cause of action existing in those parties, and that by the appointment of the court, lawfully made in a matter where the court had jurisdiction, the power had been conferred on him, in his representative capacity, to prosecute the action.

In Piscataqua F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 60 Me. 178, a bill in equity was brought in behalf of the creditors of the corporation by the plaintiffs, who were trustees, under a winding-up statute which gave them power to take charge of the estate and effects of the corporation, and to collect its debts, and to prosecute and defend suits. The defendant was a stockholder, director and treasurer of the company. The bill charged that he had illegally surrendered securities to stockholders; that he had illegally sold to the company a large amount of stock, and received payment therefor, when he knew the company was insolvent; and that he had committed a variety of other acts, which were set out in detail, done by virtue of contracts with the company, which were alleged to be illegal, fraudulent and void. A demurrer to the bill was sustained, and it was dismissed. It was there said: "The trustees represent the corporation alone, and not its creditors or stockholders. . . . The claims of the creditors and of the stockholders, if they have any, are, in the first instance, against the corporation, and they have no other except as provided by law. If the conduct of the corporation, its officers or stockholders, has been such as to give other remedies to the creditors, such may properly be pursued in their own names. So far as their rights are in question, they must be vindicated by themselves, and not by others in their behalf."

In Waterhouse v. Jamieson, 2 Paters. (Scotch) 1812, and L. R. 3 H. L. 29, Lord Westbury said before the House of Lords: "I take it to be quite settled that the rights of creditors against the stockholders of a company, when enforced by a liquidation, must be enforced by him in right of the company. What is to be paid by the shareholders is to be recovered in that right. What is due to the company is that only which is in fact recoverable by the company. The liquidator, therefore, standing in the place of the company, the question is, Has he a right to impeach the memorandum, set aside the articles, reduce the certificate and recover, in right of the company, that which the company could not for one moment, as against a bona fide shareholder, be entitled themselves to recover? I entirely adopt, in few words, what fell from my noble and learned friend [Lord Cairns] in the case of Re Duckworth, L. R. 2 Ch. 578, where my noble and learned friend used these words: 'The liquidator represents the creditors only because he represents the company, and through the company the rights of the creditors are to be enforced.' . . . Could the company recover against him? If there had been no winding-up order, the question would not have admitted of a moment's doubt, and the winding-up order does not place the liquidator in a better position against the shareholder than the company were in." In the same case, Lord Chelmsford said: "It is contended on the part of the respondent that, under the winding-up order, the liability of the appellant is entirely changed; that it is competent to the official liquidator, who, it is said, represents not only the company, but also the creditors of the company, to show that the company was founded on misrepresentation; that the allegation in the memorandum and articles of association that £100,000 had been paid was false; that the statement on the register of £100 having been paid on the appellant's shares was also false; and that the liquidator is therefore entitled to make calls upon the appellant to the extent of £100, not actually, but only nominally, paid on each of his shares. Upon examining the Companies' Act of 1862, I find nothing to warrant the assertion that the powers of the liquidator are as extensive and searching into the constitution of a company as is there alleged. He is appointed for the purpose of assisting the court in the winding-up of a company, but in all his proceedings he appears to be merely substituted for the company."

In Leifchild's Case, L. R. 1 Eq. 381, John and Robert Claypole conveyed a patent-right to the British & Foreign Cork Company, and received shares of paid-up stock therefor. No money was paid. A portion of these shares was afterwards transferred to Leifchild. It was contended that the transaction was a fraud on creditors, and the liquidator applied to have Leifchild's name put upon the list of contributors, it being claimed that the shares transferred to him were not paid-up shares. It was held that the right of creditors was only to get payment of their debts from those shareholders who were liable to contribute to the payment, and that the holders of paid-up shares were not liable to so contribute. It was further held that it was not necessary to inquire whether the creditors could obtain any relief by bill in chancery.

Defendants in error cite numerous cases in which it has been decided that a receiver could bring suit to set aside a transaction which was binding upon the person or corporation over whose estate he was appointed. Almost all of the cases cited by defendants in error fall in one or another of the four classes following: Where the receiver, by force of some statute, can act for the creditors; where the act complained of was ultra vires, and not binding upon the corporation; where the receiver was appointed in a proceeding prosecuted by creditors, which was supplemental to execution, and the receiver had the rights of the creditors at whose instance and to secure whose claims he was appointed; and where the receiver was suing for property or assets that belonged to the debtor. With the law of such cases we have no fault to find. To analyze and examine the various cases cited would unduly expand the proportions of this opinion, and would accomplish no useful purpose. We do not wish to be understood as saying that there is no conflict in the authorities in regard to the matter under consideration; but we think the decided weight of authority sustains the rule in respect to the powers of receivers, where there has been no enlargement of their powers by legislative enactment, that they have such rights of action only as were possessed by the persons or corporations upon whose estates they administer. A receiver is the right hand and creature of the court of equity, and he has such powers as are conferred upon him by the order appointing him, and the course and practice of the court. It will hardly be claimed, however, that the court of chancery, even with all its inherent powers, is authorized, in the absence of legislative sanction, to clothe its receiver with power to seize and enforce a property right which belongs only to parties who are not before the court, nor asking its assistance.

What are the powers of a receiver under the provisions of the Act for the dissolution of insurance companies? And to what extent have his powers, according to the usual course and practice of the court, been increased thereby? Section 5 of the Act provides for the appointment of "one or more persons to be receivers, to take charge of the estate and effects of the company, including such securities as may be deposited with the auditor or treasurer of state, and to collect the debts due and property belonging to it, with power to prosecute and defend suits in the name of the corporation, or in their own names, to appoint agents under them, and do all other acts necessary for the collection, marshaling and distributing of the assets of the company, and the closing of its concerns." Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 78, § 107. Section 6 of the Act is as follows: "The receiver shall pay all debts due from the company if the funds in his hands are sufficient therefor, and, if not, he shall distribute the same ratably among the creditors who prove their debts, in such manner as the court may direct, and receivers may be authorized by the court to sell, convey and dispose of, and convert into money, any of the securities or assets of the company, for the purpose of paying such debts and distributing such funds. If there is a balance remaining after the payment of the debts, the receiver shall distribute the same among those who are justly entitled thereto, as members, stockholders, or otherwise, or their legal representatives." Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 78, § 108. These two sections contain all of the powers that are expressly given to the receiver by the Statute. It will be noted that no provision is made in the Act for the execution of an assignment by the corporation to the receiver. It would seem that the property rights of the company are committed, by force of the Statute and by virtue of the decree of the court appointing a receiver, to the charge of such receiver, to be sued for, sold, conveyed and disposed of, and converted into money, as the court may direct. It appears that a decree ordering the execution of an assignment, and the making of an assignment to the receiver, are not necessary in order to vest in the latter full and exclusive charge and control, under the direction of the court, of the property rights of the company. In this particular case such decree and such assignment were in fact made, and so, in any view that may be taken, the property rights of the corporation have in fact vested in Ward, the receiver and assignee. The powers of the receiver specially designated in the Statute do not seem to be essentially different from those mentioned in the Voluntary Assignment Act as being given to the assignee under a voluntary assignment. In both Acts the powers specified seem to be limited to the enforcement of property rights derived from the corporation or assignor, respectively. Section 5 of the Dissolution Act defines the powers and property rights of the receivers. It says they are "to take charge of the estate and effects of the company," "to collect the debts due and properly belonging to it" (the company), "to prosecute and defend suits in the name of the corporation, or in their own names," "to do all acts necessary for the collection, marshaling and distributing of the assets of the company," and "to do all acts necessary for the closing of its concerns." Section 6 defines the duties of the receiver in respect to paying out and distributing such moneys as may be in his hands, and also gives him power, when authorized by the court, to sell, convey and dispose of, and convert into money, any of the securities or assets of the company. The property rights donated him, or given into his charge, are the estate and effects of the company, the debts due the company, and the property belonging to it. We have already seen that in this case there were no debts due the Company, from the stockholders here in question. To say "the estate and effects of the company" means precisely the same thing as saying "the estate and effects owned by the company," Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Barker, 125 Ill. 308; Montgomery v. Wyman, 130 Ill. 17. We do not find any words in said sections which afford any pretense for claiming that the powers of the receiver are so enlarged thereby as to include the right to impeach a transaction which the corporation could not challenge, but which the creditors could arraign, unless such enlargement is accomplished by the use of the words "the assets of the company," or follows by necessary implication from the power given the receiver to marshal assets, or by like implication from the power donated "to do all acts necessary for the closing of the concerns" of the company. As now used, the expression "the assets of a person, corporation or estate" is generally equivalent to the expression "the property of such person, corporation or estate." From the connection in which the expression "the assets of the company" is found in this Statute, we think it has reference only to the estate, effects, securities, debts and property specified in said Statute, and which are to be placed in charge of the receiver. There may be frequent occasion for the application by the receiver of the equitable doctrine of marshaling, without any such amplification of the funds to be administered by him as is contended for by the defendants in error; and so there is no sufficient justification for saying that such enlargement follows by necessary intentment. The expression "the concerns of the company" falls in the same category with the phrase "the assets of the company." Although broad enough, in one sense, to include the enforcement of claims which the company could not enforce, but which its creditors could, yet we think, from the context, that they were not intended to thus magnify the powers of the receiver. The expression may be given a signification which is both reasonable and usual, and is also consistent with the other parts of the Statute, and with the functions of a receiver according to the course and practice of the court, without holding that there is any enlargement of the powers of the receiver beyond what is specified in the Statute, and therefore it cannot be held that an expression in that behalf results by implication. An administrator is merely the representative of his intestate. An assignee is not the representative of creditors, but is the agent of the assignor for the distribution of the property assigned. A receiver, virtute officii, and without regard to any expansion of his powers by statute or by an authorized decree of court, is only a custodian of property. He is ordinarily, in respect to his title, and in respect to the litigations in which he may engage, merely the representative of the owners of the property submitted to his control. But so far as his powers are derived from a statute, or from a lawful decree of the court, and the powers do not involve rights which at the time of his appointment were vested in such owners, he is not merely their representative, but is the instrument of the law, and the agent of the court which appointed him. Such right and authority as the law and the court rightfully give him, he possesses; and, in respect to such right, he is not circumscribed and limited by the right which was vested in and available to the owners.

It is claimed by counsel for defendants in error, and the claim is supported by very able and learned arguments, that the Legislature, in enacting the law here under consideration, invested the court of equity with jurisdiction and authority to make final settlement of the unfinished business of the corporation, and close up its concerns, and that this authority, when supplemented by the powers inherent in the court of chancery, was amply sufficient to warrant the court in making the order which is here called in question, and in doing all other acts necessary for the accomplishment of the ultimate purposes contemplated by the Act. But, as we have already seen, the ultimate purposes intended by the Act are to perpetually enjoin insurance companies which fall within its purview from the further continuance of the business for which they were organized, and to enable the court, through its receivers, to administer upon the estates, effects, securities, property and assets owned by such companies, and upon the debts due them. The means by which these objects are to be accomplished are designated and fixed by the Statute itself. The ninth section of the Act provides: "The mode of summoning parties into court, the rules of practice, course of procedure, and powers of courts, in cases arising under this Act, shall be the same as in ordinary proceedings in equity in this State, except as herein otherwise provided." As we have already, in substance, remarked in another connection, it is not a power inherent in the court of chancery, and it is not in conformity with the course of procedure and rules of practice which obtain in ordinary proceedings in equity, for the court to clothe its receiver with power to seize and enforce a property right which belongs only to parties who are not before the court, and who are not asking its assistance. Nor is it provided in the Statute, nor legitimately deducible therefrom, as is the case in respect to the statutes in force in some jurisdictions, that the receiver may represent creditors, and bring suits to set aside acts of the persons or corporations whose property is in charge of the receiver, which were in fraud of such creditors. The Legislature has made no provision of this kind, and, in its absence, it does not devolve upon the courts, by judicial legislation, to assume a jurisdiction that they have not heretofore possessed. Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that the order made by the circuit court on January 31, 1878, authorizing and directing the receiver to institute proceedings against the subscribers to the stock and stockholders of plaintiff in error, was erroneous.

One of the assignments of error is that the court erred in making each and every of the orders and decrees set forth in the record. It is claimed that an order made in January, 1878, directing the receiver to pay a "dividend of fifteen per cent of all accepted valuations made by him of policies and certified by the actuary of the state insurance department, and of all other admitted liabilities of the said Republic Life Insurance Company," etc., was erroneous. The Statute provides for the payment of dividends to "creditors who prove their debts," and it is claimed that this statutory requirement was disregarded in making said order. As we understand the record, no objection was made to this order upon the first submission of the case nor until after the awarding of a rehearing. The receiver, acting in good faith upon this order, paid out $93,568.99, and his report of such payments was confirmed by the court. There was no objection taken in the court below, either to the order or to the report. The order was a final and appealable order. But no appeal was taken, or writ of error sued out, until after the entry of the final decree in the cause. We think that, under the circumstances, the objections now urged should not be considered by us. The order, without any examination by us, should be allowed to stand for the protection of the receiver.

The final decree perpetually enjoining the plaintiff in error from further prosecution of its business is affirmed. The order and decree licensing the receiver to set aside the transactions by which unpaid stock was surrendered and paid-up stock issued, is reversed.

Magruder, J.:

This is a controversy between creditors on the one side and stockholders on the other. Having acted as attorney for one of the creditors in the court below, I have taken no part in the decision of this case.

Scholfield, Ch. J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the foregoing opinion. I think that the Statute conferred ample power upon the circuit court to make the order in question. Although the corporation may be estopped to sue these subscribers for stock, the receiver is not, for he represents, as to the transaction whereby they claim to be protected from suit by the corporation, both the corporation and its creditors, and it is his duty to collect the amounts subscribed for the benefit of the creditors. 2 Morawetz, Priv. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages because of abuse to which he was subjected while a passenger on defendant's car. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart for appellant.

Messrs. P. E. Theard & Sons, for appellee :

A street railway company is answerable in damages for the insulting conduct of one of its drivers towards a passenger.

Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 40 La. Ann. 87; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202; Keene v. Lizardi, 5 La. 481; Block v. Bannerman, 10 La. Ann. 1; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 55 U. S. 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502; Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 2815, 2817.

A street railway company is also responsible for the unlawful and unwarranted arrest of a passenger, on a malicious charge made by one of its drivers that the passenger had passed a counterfeit coin. Proof of actual damage in such cases is not necessary.

McEnery, J., delivered the opinion of the court :

The plaintiff sued the defendant Company for $20,000 for damages for abuse when in defendant's car, and for damages for malicious prosecution, and false arrest and imprisonment. There was judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $400, from which the defendant appealed. The facts are that on the 27th day of December, 1889, the plaintiff entered the street-car of the defendant Company. He handed to the driver of the car, through the change gate, one silver dollar for change. The drivers of the cars are instructed to furnish change to the amount of two dollars to passengers. The driver returned to the plaintiff 95 cents, 15 cents of which he placed in the fare-box for himself and friends. There was some altercation about the change being short five cents. The driver gave the plaintiff five cents to make good the deficiency. After going several squares, the driver charged the plaintiff with having handed a counterfeit dollar to him, for which he had given him the change. The driver, in the hearing of the passengers, threatened to have the plaintiff arrested when he reached the station. He frequently looked at the plaintiff in a menacing manner, which attracted attention, and placed the plaintiff under suspicion. When the car reached the station the driver and the starter at the station had the plaintiff arrested by a policeman, and confined in prison for a short while. There was a charge of passing counterfeit money lodged ter is dashed upon a passenger while being carried, it is a breach of the contract. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jackson, 61 Ind. 12, 6 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 178.

Assaulting passenger.

Where an agent commits an assault in the line of his duty and within the scope of his employment, the master is liable. Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 18 Abb. Pr. N. S. 818; Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 3 Jones & S. 118.

It is a joint trespass, for which a joint or several action against either the principal or agent could be sustained. Priest v. Hudson River R. Co. 40 How. Pr. 456.

A railroad company is responsible for an assault and battery by the conductor of one of its trains upon a passenger in seizing or attempting to seize his property to enforce payment of his fare. Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 117. See Moore v. Fitchburg R. Corp. 4 Gray, 465; Hewett v. Smith, 8 Allen, 420; Holmes v. Wakefield, 12 Allen, 580.

Striking him, throwing him down, trampling on him, etc., is ground of action against the company for assault and battery. Priest v. Hudson River R. Co. 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 60.

Where a person is assaulted and grossly insulted by a brakeman employed on the train, the company is liable. Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202.

Where a conductor on a train makes an indecent assault on a female passenger the company is liable for compensatory damages. Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 9 Am. Ry. Rep. 118.

Removing trespasser from train.

Removing a trespasser from a train of cars while the train is moving very slowly is not negligence 12 L. R. A.

or wantonness per se. Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Sanford (Kan.) 11 L. R. A. 432.

Where a boy fifteen years old gets upon a freight train, for the purpose of riding, without paying his fare, and is commanded by the brakeman to jump off the train while in dangerous motion, and in fear of being thrown off obeys the command and is injured thereby, the company is liable. Kansas City, F. S. & G. R. Co. v. Kelly, 36 Kan. 655.

A child riding upon a platform without the payment of fare is a trespasser; but if the driver ejects him in a manner endangering life or limb, the company is liable. Biddle v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 8 Cent. Rep. 404, 112 Pa. 551. See Duff v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 91 Pa. 458; Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 522; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375.

A street-car company is liable for the act of its driver in attempting to put off a boy who is trespassing upon the car, who jumps off and receives injuries resulting in death, if the driver's acts caused a belief that he was about to inflict bodily punishment upon the boy. Hogan v. Central Park, N. & E. R. R. Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 702. See McCann v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. 117 N. Y. 505.

Ejecting passenger from train.

Although a servant of a carrier may be obliged to use force in the enforcement of reasonable regulations established by the carrier, the carrier will not be protected if he uses excessive or unnecessary force. New Jersey S. B. Co. v. Brockett, 121 U. S. 637, 30 L. ed. 1049; Sanford v. Eighth Avenue R. Co. 23 N. Y. 345.

If the conductor, acting in the performance of his duty, exceeds the degree of force necessary and proper to accomplish the purpose of removal, and against plaintiff. The prosecution was dismissed, as the dollar which it is alleged was counterfeit was a good coin. There is some conflict of testimony as to the exact point where the plaintiff was arrested. But we believe his statement is corroborated that he was arrested at the request of the driver by the policeman, in response to the "whistle,"—a signal for the officer which he blew before the car stopped,—just as he was stepping from the car. The petition of plaintiff contains two causes of action,—one for abuse and defamation when in defendant's car, and the other for malicious prosecution. On the latter cause, the record does not show that the charge against plaintiff, and his consequent arrest, instigated by the driver of the car, was done in the exercise of the functions in which he was employed. The driver had no instructions to make arrest for the passing of counterfeit money. No inference of such authority can be drawn from the fact of changing money for passengers. He does this at his own risk and responsibility; the Company loses nothing if counterfeit coin is accepted by the driver, as he is charged with it. It has no interest, therefore, in the arrest of the person attempting to pass counterfeit money, other than that which induces every citizen to make known crime when committed. It may be, as alleged by plaintiff, that the act was malicious, willful and tortious, but, as it was not done within the scope of the driver's employment, the defendant Company cannot be held responsible in damages. Rev. Civil Code, art. 3820; Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 40 La. Ann. 88; Gerber v. Viosea, 8 Rob. (La.) 150; Ware v. Baratarias & L. Canal

Co. 15 La. 169; Dyer v. Risley, 28 La. Ann. 6; Cooley, Torts, p. 536.

The plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's street-car line. He had paid his fare to his destination. He behaved himself with propriety. He was not drunk or disorderly. The complaint against him for passing counterfeit money was groundless. He was subjected to insult and defamation by the driver in the presence of other passengers. If not subjected to arrest within the car, he was practically placed under surveillance by the driver from the time he was charged with passing the counterfeit dollar until he arrived at his destination. In the case of Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 40 La. Ann. 88, we quoted from and approved of the law as expressed in the case of Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 87 Me. 202. In that case the court said: "The carrier's obligation is to carry his passenger safely and properly, and to treat him respectfully, and if he intrusts the performance of this duty to his servants, the law holds him responsible for the manner in which they execute the trust. He must not only protect his passengers against the violence and insults of strangers and co-passengers, but a fortiori against the violence and insults of his own servants." Ibid. The same doctrine is laid down in the case of Keene v. Lizardi, 5 La. 431; also referred to and affirmed in the cases of Williams v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 40 La. Ann. 88, and Mallach v. Ridley, 15 N. Y. S. R. 4.

There was no conductor on defendant's car. The driver was in exclusive control of the car, and charged with the safe delivery of the passengers. He was the only servant of the Company, and injury results, the company is also liable. Jackson v. Second Ave. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 274. See Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 117; Higgins v. Water-villet Turnp. & R. Co. 46 N. Y. 23. See notes to South-ern Kansas R. Co. v. Sanford (Kan.) 11 L. R. A. 432.

If the agent uses more force than is necessary to eject a passenger, or uses vile epithets toward him, such conduct should always be considered by the jury in aggravation of damages. Quigley v. Central Pac. R. Co. 11 Nev. 360.

Where a passenger stricken with apoplexy is removed from a street-car by the driver, in a helpless condition, and laid in the street, on a bleak, drizzling day, and there abandoned, the company is liable. Conolly v. Crescent City R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 87.

His mistake in supposing that the passenger was drunk, when he had ridden a considerable distance without misbehavior, will not excuse the company from liability. Ibid.

The refusal of a passenger to pay his fare will not justify any act which would put human life in peril, and a passenger has a right to repel an attempt to eject him in order to save his own life, from the unjustifiable assault of the conductor. Hoffman v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 24; Bounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129; Lynch v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 77; Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 121; Noble v. Cunningham, 74 Ill. 58; Northwestern R. Co. v. Haak, 65 Ill. 242; Robinson v. Webb, 11 Bush, 464, cited in New Jersey S. B. Co. v. Brockett, 121 U. S. 637, 30 L. ed. 1051.

Action of damages for personal injury or death.

It is essential to the maintenance of an action for a tort that damages should accompany the act complained of; otherwise it is damnum absque injuria, for which no action lies. Knapp v. Roche, 94 N. Y. 12 L. R. A.

839; Commercial Bank of Albany v. Ten Eyck, 48 N. Y. 806; People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 541.

A railway company cannot be held liable in damages because its conductor informed a husband in a brusque manner, in the presence of his wife, that they must pay their fares or get off, and, at the next station, said in a decided or rude tone that they must get off. Rose v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 106 N. C. 168.

Where the enforcement of a regulation was attended with unnecessary or cruel severity, the declarations of the servant made at the time are competent evidence against the carrier, and a part of the res gestæ. Vicksburg & N. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 30 L. ed. 290; Ohio & N. W. R. Co. v. Porter, 92 Ill. 437; Toledo & W. R. Co. v. Goddard, 25 Ind. 190.

Where there was evidence tending to show that after defendant had notice that its brakeman had committed the injuries complained of it retained him in its service and promoted him, it might be such a ratification of the brakeman's act as to authorize the jury to award exemplary damages. Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 39 Wis. 636, 18 Am. Ry. Rep. 414; Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 654, 15 Am. Ry. Rep. 45; Gasway v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. 58 Ga. 216, 16 Am. Ry. Rep. 99.

A verdict against a railroad company for an assault committed upon a passenger by one of its employees is sustained by evidence that the person committing the assault was at the time acting as brakeman under the authority of the defendant, though not on his regular train. Conger v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (Minn.) Jan. 12, 1891. See notes to Smith v. Kanawha County Ct. (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 82; Conolly v. Crescent City R. Co. (La. Ann.) 8 L. R. A. 134; *Dillingham v. pany to whom the passengers could look for protection. It is difficult to estimate damages to feelings and reputation. If the plaintiff was possessed of any pride, or had any regard for his character, his humiliation in the presence of others, when in defendant's car, must have produced the severest mortification. Under the facts presented in this case, it was the peculiar province of the jury to estimate the damages. In the case of Griffin v. Shreveport & A. R. Co., 41 La. Ann. 808, we said: "While we are not bound by the findings of a jury, even on questions of fact or of damage, and do not hesitate to reverse them when manifestly erroneous or excessive, yet we give them the weight to which they are justly entitled, and do not lightly disturb them."

The claim for damages for the false arrest and malicious prosecution did not go to the jury. Their finding was confined to the insult, abuse and defamation while in defendant's car. We see no reason to disturb the amount awarded by the jury.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

Phineas FONSECA

v.

CUNARD STEAMSHIP CO. (Limited).

(.....Mass.....)

1. A ticket for a voyage purporting to be a contract, containing written and printed stipulations which cover the greater part of two quarto pages, bearing the signature of the carrier's agent with a blank space for that of the passenger, charges the latter with notice of the stipulations, and they are binding on him although he did not read them.
2. The fact that a passenger does not sign a ticket which constitutes a contract and has a blank space for his signature does not relieve him from the effects of its stipulations.
3. A contract to carry a passenger exempting the carrier from liability even for negligence, if it was valid where it was made, will be upheld by the courts of a State in which such contracts are held void as against public policy.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Pitman, J.) for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to his trunk and contents while said trunk was in defendant's possession for transportation, in which a verdict had been entered for plaintiff. Judgment for defendant.

Plaintiff was a steerage passenger on defendant's steamship "Samarra" from Liverpool to Boston on a trip commencing November 7, 1888. He had with him his trunk containing clothing and personal effects. During the voyage the trunk and contents were entirely ruined by defendant's negligence.

At the time plaintiff engaged passage he re-

The right of a passenger to be carried upon a railroad upon a "tourist's" or "round-trip" ticket depends upon the written contract signed by him thereon, and not upon representations made by an officer of the company. Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 127 U. S. 390, 32 L. ed. 249.

Where a passenger ticket contains limitations of the carrier's liability printed thereon, with a blank space thereunder for the passenger's signature, but the passenger is not requested to sign his name thereto, and the conditions are not made known to him, there is no contract and no restriction or limitation of the liability of the carrier. *Kansas City, St. J. & C. Where the failure to make the claim occurs without fault or negligence of the parties entitled to the money, it will be excused and will not prevent a recovery. Ibid.

ceived from defendant's agent a ticket entitled "Passenger Contract Ticket," upon the bottom of which appeared "The passenger's luggage is carried only on the conditions on the back hereof."

On the back of the ticket among other things was written "The Company is not liable for loss of or injury to the passenger or his luggage, or delay in the voyage, whether arising from the act of God, the queen's enemies, perils of the sea, rivers or navigation, restraint of princes, rulers and peoples, barratry or negligence of the Company's servants (whether on board the steamer or not), defect in the steamer, her machinery, gear or fittings, or from any other cause, of whatsoever nature."

The defendant relied on the provisions of the contract to defeat the action. The court found for the plaintiff and reported the case for the consideration of this court.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Appleton for plaintiff.

Messrs. George Putnam and Thomas Russell for defendant.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not expressly stated in the report that the law of England was put in evidence as a fact in the case; but it seems to have been assumed at the trial, if not expressly agreed, that this law should be considered, and the argument before this court has proceeded on the same assumption. It is conceded that the presiding justice correctly found and ruled as follows: "That the contract was a British contract; that by the English law a carrier may by contract exempt himself from liability, even for loss caused by his negligence; that in this case, as the carrier has so attempted, and the terms are broad enough to exonerate him, the question remains of assent on the part of the plaintiff." That part of his ruling which is called in question by the defendant is as follows: "This has been decided in Massachusetts to be a question of evidence, in which the lex fori is to govern. That, although it has been decided that the law conclusively presumes that a consignor knows and assents to the terms of a bill of lading or a shipping receipt which he takes without dissent, yet a passenger ticket, even though it be called a "contract ticket," does not stand on the same footing. That in this case assent is not a conclusion of law, and is not proved as a matter of fact."

The principal question before us is whether the plaintiff, by reason of his acceptance and use of his ticket, shall be conclusively held to have assented to its terms. It has often been decided that one who accepts a contract, and proceeds to avail himself of its provisions, is bound by the stipulations and conditions expressed in it whether he reads them or not. Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 506; Monitor Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Buffum, 115 Mass. 348; Rice v. Dwight Mfg. Co. 2 Cush. 80; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304; Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 90. This rule is as applicable to contracts for the carriage of persons or property as to contracts of any other kind. Grace v. Adams, supra; Boston & M. R. Co. v. Chipman, 146 Mass. 107, 12 L. R. A.

The cases in which it is held that one who receives a ticket which appears to be a mere check, showing the points between which he is entitled to be carried, and which contains conditions on its back which he does not read, is not bound by such conditions, do not fall within this rule. Brown v. Eastern R. Co. 11 Cush. 97; Malone v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 12 Gray, 383; Henderson v. Stevenson, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 470; Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 806; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 535. Such a ticket does not purport to be a contract which expressly states the rights of the parties, but only a check to indicate the route over which the passenger is to be carried, and he is not expected to examine it to see whether it contains any unusual stipulations. The precise question in the present case is whether the "contract ticket" was of such a kind that the passenger taking it should have understood that it was a contract containing stipulations which would determine the rights of the parties in reference to his carriage. If so, he would be expected to read it, and if he failed to do so he is bound by its stipulations. It covered with print and writing the greater part of two large quarto pages, and bore the signature of the defendant Company affixed by its agent, with a blank space for the signature of the passenger. The fact that it was not signed by the plaintiff is immaterial. Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 365, 5 L. R. A. 846, and cases there cited. It contained elaborate provisions in regard to the rights of the passenger on the voyage, and even went into such detail as to give the bill of fare for each meal in the day for every day of the week. No one who could read could glance at it without seeing that it undertook expressly to prescribe the particulars which should govern the conduct of the parties until the passenger reached the port of destination. In that particular it was entirely unlike the pasteboard tickets which are commonly sold to passengers on railroads. In reference to this question the same rules of law apply to a contract to carry a passenger as to a contract for the transportation of goods. There is no reason why a consignor who is bound by the provisions of a bill of lading, which he accepts without reading, should not be equally bound by the terms of a contract in similar form to receive and transport him as a passenger.

In Henderson v. Stevenson, supra, the ticket was for transportation a short distance, from Dublin to Whitehaven, and the passenger was held not bound to read the notice on the back, because it did not purport to be a contract, but a mere check given as evidence of his right to carriage. In later English cases it is said that this decision went to the extreme limit of the law, and it has repeatedly been distinguished from cases where the ticket was in a different form. Parker v. South-Eastern R. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 416, 428; Harris v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 515; Burke v. South-Eastern R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 1.

The passenger in the last-mentioned case had a coupon ticket, and it was held that he was bound to know what was printed as a part of the ticket. Stears v. Liverpool, N. Y. & P. S. S. Co., 57 N. Y. 1, is in its essential facts almost identical with the case at bar, and it was held that the passenger was bound by the conditions printed on the ticket.

In Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co., supra, the same principle was applied to the case of a passenger traveling on a free pass, and no sound distinction can be made between that case and the case at bar.

We are of opinion that the ticket delivered to the plaintiff purported to be a contract, and that the defendant corporation had a right to assume that he consented to its provisions. All these provisions are equally binding on him as if he had read them.

The contract being valid in England where it was made, and the plaintiff's acceptance of it under the circumstances being equivalent to an express assent to it, and it not being illegal or immoral, it will be enforced here, notwithstanding that a similar contract made in Massachusetts would be held void as against public policy. Greenwood v. Gustis, 6 Mass. 358; Forepaugh v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 128 Pa. 217, 5 L. R. A. 508, and cases cited; Re Missouri Steamship Co. L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 326, 337; *Liverpool & G. W. S. Co. v. have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The sixth ground insisted on in the court below for the granting of a new trial was for alleged error in giving the following instruction: "It is important, as you must perceive, to understand when, in the sense of the law, a roadbed is in a defective condition. It is in such condition when the roadbed is not reasonably safe for the passage over it of the company's trains. There is no obligation, however, on the company to have the roadbed absolutely safe. Where the roadbed of a railroad is in a reasonably safe condition, and therefore not defective, the company, of course, would not be responsible for any injury which, notwithstanding, occurred to an employé from the derailing of a train."

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question in this case is as to the proper construction and effect of Rule 23, which was relied upon by the Railroad Company to discharge it from all liability to the employé. That rule is as follows: "The conditions of employment by the Company are that the regular compensation paid for the services of employés shall cover all risks incurred, and liability to accident from any cause whatever, while in the service of this Company. If an employé is disabled by accident, or other cause, the right to claim compensation for injuries will not be recognized. Allowance, when made in such cases, will be as a gratuity, justified by the circumstances of the case and previous good conduct of the party. The fact of remaining in the service of the Company will be considered acceptance of these conditions. All officers employing men to work for this Company will have these conditions distinctly understood and agreed to by each employé before he enters the service of the Company." It appears from the evidence that Dooly was employed as flagman on the 21st of June, 1887, and then receipted for a copy of the book of rules and regulations, which contained Rule 23. He was promoted from the position of flagman to that of conductor, while he was in possession of the book of rules. He was familiar with the rule which required employés to know the rules and regulations. The accident happened on August 2, and he had been in possession of the rule-book about forty-two days. Under this state of facts, the able counsel for the plaintiff in error insisted that, as Dooly had receipted for the book of rules, and kept them in his possession up to the time of the accident, and remained in the employment of the Company, he thereby assented to Rule 23, and as matter of law was bound by it, and that the court should have so charged, instead of leaving it to the jury to say whether he assented to the rule or not. Under the facts of this case we do not think the court should have charged the jury that Dooly, on account of this rule, could not recover. It will be seen that the last clause of the rule is: "All officers employing men to work for this Company will have these conditions distinctly understood and agreed to by each employé before he enters the service of the Company." It affirmatively appears from the evidence that this clause of the rule was not complied with by the officer of the Company employing Dooly. Dooly's attention was not called to this specific rule. Nothing was said to him about it. Therefore he could not have "distinctly understood and agreed" to it. The object of this clause of the rule was to have each employé make an express contract with the Company, waiving his right to recover for any "accident from any cause whatever while in the service of the Company." If an express contract to this effect had been made by Dooly under the common law (which governs this case) it is likely he would have been bound by it; but, inasmuch as he made no express contract, we do not think he was bound by the rule. It is insisted, however, that although he made no express contract, there was an implied contract between him and the Company, because the Company gave him the rule-book, which contained this rule; and as he had time and opportunity to read it, and remained in the employment of the Company, he impliedly agreed to the rule, and therefore could not recover. We think that wherever a corporation employs a person and gives him its printed rules governing his conduct as an employé, and he can read, and has had sufficient time to become acquainted with the rules of the employer, he is bound by every rule of the employer which is to govern his conduct while in the service, whether he has read the rule or has knowledge of it or not. The employer has the right to make the rules for the government of his employés. It is to his interest to do so, and he has the right to have those rules obeyed; and an employé has no right to violate them, and set up as an excuse his want of knowledge of them, after he has had an opportunity to become acquainted with them. He is bound by every reasonable rule which is to govern him in his work or conduct. If one of these rules should require him to couple cars with a stick, and he should undertake to couple them with his hand, and in consequence should be injured, he would not be allowed to say that he had no knowledge of the rule. Or if one of the rules should require him to give so many days' notice before quitting the employer's service, or in default thereof lose his pay, he could not, if he quit the service without such notice, recover his wages because he was ignorant of the rule. This is the principle upon which the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error were decided. Harmon v. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. 35 Me. 447, 58 Am. Dec. 718, and note; Preston v. American Linen Co. 119 Mass. 403; Collins v. New England Iron Co. 115 Mass. 23; Stevens v. Reeves, 9 Pick. 198; Bradley v. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. 30 N. H. 487. It will be seen by reading these cases that the rules in each one of them were to govern the conduct of the employé while in the service of the employer, and prescribed penalties for non-compliance. But where the rule requires the employé to waive certain rights which are not connected with his duty as an employé, then, in our opinion, it does not bind him, although he has knowledge of it, unless he has expressly agreed thereto. The fact that he kept the rules in his possession, and remained in the service of the Company, would not bar his right to recover, unless he expressly agreed to that particular rule. And this is especially so in this case, as the rule itself requires that the employé shall distinctly understand and agree to it. We think, therefore, that the charges complained of on this point, and set out in grounds 7, 8, 9 and 9a of the motion for a new trial, were more favorable to the railroad than they ought to have been. Under the above view the special exceptions taken in the seventh and eighth grounds are not material, and would not, if they were sustained, be cause for reversal. The error complained of in the sixth ground is that "the court did not qualify its instruction by reference to roadbeds of other railways reasonably well-conducted in the State of Alabama;" counsel contending that the criterion as to what constituted a roadbed in reasonably good condition was the condition of other well-conducted railroads in Alabama; The court could not have made this qualification without evidence to predicate it upon, and, if evidence had been offered as to the roadbeds of other railways in Alabama, it would have been inadmissible, as we held in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Chaffin, 84 Ga. 519.

The fifth ground complains that the court erred in refusing, on motion of counsel for the defendant, to have the verdict rendered on a former trial detached from the declaration before the same was handed to the jury, he insisting that such former verdict would prejudice the defendant's case notwithstanding any instruction which the court might give to the jury on the subject. Speaking for myself, I think the trial judge should have granted this motion. The general rule is that it is a ground for new trial for any paper or writing to go to the jury and be read by them which is calculated to prejudice or influence them against any of the parties, unless it has been properly admitted in evidence; and I think the verdict of a former jury in the same case might be calculated to prejudice or influence the minds of a succeeding jury, although it had been set aside. It represents the opinion of their twelve predecessors in the same case that the plaintiff or the defendant is entitled to recover, and, when the plaintiff, their opinion also as to the amount of the recovery; and it cannot be denied that the unanimous judgment of twelve upright and intelligent citizens, under oath, sometimes carries great weight, not only with twelve succeeding jurors in the case, but with the community at large. Whether this be sound or not, we all think the better practice is, when either party so requests, to detach, erase or in some way conceal the former verdict so that the jury cannot know from the papers in the case what that verdict was.

Another rule on this subject is that, if a paper or writing calculated to prejudice or influence the jury gets before them illegally, but is not read by them, a new trial will not be granted upon this ground. And the record in this case shows, by the affidavits of eight of the jurors (the other four being inaccessible), that this first verdict was not known or read by them until after the second verdict had been agreed upon and signed by the foreman. This being true, the jury could not have been influenced by the first verdict. If it was not read by them it is the same as though it had not been delivered to them; and, substantial justice having been done between the parties, we will not grant a new trial upon this ground of the motion alone. As to papers, writings, verdicts, etc., getting before the jury illegally, and the rules governing the subject, see 2 Thomp. Trials, §§ 2576, 2580; Killen v. Sistrunk, 7 Ga. 294; Biggins v. Brown, 12 Ga. 271; Walker v. Hunter, 17 Ga. 384; Lovett v. State, 60 Ga. 257; Wilkins v. Maddrey, 67 Ga. 766; Harri-man v. Wilkins, 20 Me. 98; Green v. State, 38 Ark. 818; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Higgins (Ark.) 14 S. W. Rep. 654.

The motion also complains that the verdict was contrary to evidence and excessive. We think there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the jury. If the evidence for the plaintiff is to be believed, the Railroad Company was very negligent in allowing its cross-ties to become so rotten as this evidence shows them to have been. While the verdict is a large one, the facts of the case show that Dooly was badly and permanently injured, and that from this injury his heart has become displaced or enlarged, so much so that he must be in constant dread of death. An eminent physician testified that if he were in Dooly's condition he would not run a hundred yards for the universe. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the other grounds of the motion, because the points made therein are immaterial, and would not work a reversal of the case if they were sustained.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jefferson County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to render defendants personally liable for a debt contracted by them in the name and on account of the Wool Growers' Exchange, an alleged corporation. Reversed.

Statement by Williams, J.:

The original action was commenced in the Court of Common Pleas of Jefferson County, on the 3d day of January, 1885, by the Farmers' Co-operative Trust Company, the plaintiff in error, against John Floyd, Davidson S. John Farris, John Coad, Nathaniel Wells and Virginius P. Duvall. Summons was duly served upon those who are defendants in error in this court, but no service was obtained upon the other defendants in the action below. On the 8th of May, 1885, the plaintiff filed an amended petition, which (omitting the caption) is as follows: "The said plaintiff complains of the said defendants and says that it is a corporation duly organized under the laws of and doing business in the State of Pennsylvania; that the said defendants, from the 6th day of May, 1878, until the 11th day of April, 1888, were associated together in the buying and selling of wool, and doing a general merchandizing business in wool, under the name and style of the 'Wool Growers' Exchange,' that the places of business of said association were at Steubenville, Jefferson County, Ohio, and the City of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania; that in the formation of said association the said defendants, John F. Hartshorn, Nathaniel Wells, S. N. Orr, Benjamin Griffith, William M. Lee, J. D. Whitham, A. C. Ault, Davidson S. Gault, Virginius P. Duvall and John Floyd, undertook, in their names as incorporators, to organize a corporation for said association under the laws of the State of Ohio, under the name of the 'Wool Growers' Exchange,' and did obtain a pretended certificate of incorporation from the secretary of state of the State of Ohio for that purpose, but said plaintiff avers that said defendants, or either of them, or any person for them or on their behalf, never had or procured said association to be properly or legally incorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio, or of any other State. Said plaintiff avers that said pretended incorporators set forth in their said pretended certificate, filed with the secretary of state, that the capital stock of said organization shall be fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), and yet they, said pretended incorporators, gave notice to the pretended stockholders to meet for the purpose of choosing directors when less than $3,000 of the capital stock had been subscribed, and less than $2,000 of the capital stock paid in, and said pretended stockholders, including said incorporators, did meet on the 19th day of June, 1878, and held an election under said notice, and elected said defendants, William M. Lee, president; John Floyd, vice-president; J. D. Whitham, treasurer; Benjamin Griffith, secretary; and Davidson S. Gault, R. C. Vance, S. N. Orr, John Medill, John Farris and John Coad, directors of said pretended corporation. Plaintiff says that afterwards, to wit, March 16, 1881, the said defendant A. C. Ault was added to said pretended board of directors. Plaintiff says that at no time has there been more than $3,000 of the pretended capital stock of $50,000 of said pretended corporation subscribed, nor more than $2,000 paid in, and that all of said defendants, incorporators, officers and directors knew during all the time they conducted the business of said association that not more than $3,000 of the capital stock had been subscribed, and not more than $2,000 paid in. Said plaintiff further says that said incorporators, nor any of them, nor any person for them, gave any notice by publication of the opening of the books of said corporation for subscription to the capital stock; neither were the books ordered opened nor in fact opened, for subscription to the capital stock. Said plaintiff further says that from the time of the organization of said pretended corporation or association until its close by assignment, on the 11th day of April, 1888, said defendants had control of the affairs of said association and did a large business in the buying and selling of wool, amounting to thousands of dollars annually, borrowed large sums of money, contracting a large indebtedness. Plaintiff further says that on or about April 1, 1881, said defendants removed the business of the said association to Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, contrary to the provisions of the pretended charter of said association. Plaintiff says that between the 1st day of August and the 1st day of December, A. D. 1883, it sold to said defendants, doing business under the name of the 'Wool Growers' Exchange,' as aforesaid, 81,840 pounds of wool, which was delivered to said defendants at the City of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, and that on the 8th day of January, 1883, there was a balance due said plaintiff from said defendants on account of said wool so sold and delivered to them, the sum of $8,195. Plaintiff says that the said pretended charter obtained by said defendants was under the Act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, entitled 'An Act Supplementary to An Act Entitled "An Act to Provide for the Creation and Regulation of Incorporated Companies in the State of Ohio," passed May 1, 1852,' passed April 18, 1867, as amended April 20, 1874, as amended April 11, 1876, as amended March 12, 1877, as amended March 28, 1878, and that said pretended charter sets forth the object of said association as follows: 'That we have associated ourselves together for the purpose of forming an organization to establish a wool-house, and handle wool, merchandise, produce and furnishing supplies to wool-growers and others, on commission and purchase or sale, or in such other manner as will be for the best interest of the stockholders herein, and to do a general commission business in the articles above enumerated, and also for the purposes of disseminating through bureaus or journals useful knowledge and information pertaining to the improvement and protection of wool-growing interests.' Plaintiff says that under said pretended charter and said Act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, under which the said pretended charter was obtained, said defendants had no authority or power as a corporation to buy or sell wool, and that therefore all of said acts of said defendants in a pretended corporate capacity, in the buying and selling of wool, and in the buying of said wool from said plaintiff, were ultra vires and invalid. Plaintiff says that said defendants, on the 8th day of January, 1883, through said defendant J. D. Whitham, their agent, executed and delivered to plaintiff, as evidence of said indebtedness, a promissory note, of which the following is a true copy:

" 'Cochranstown, Pa., Jan. 8, 1883.
 " 'March 20th, after date, for value received, we jointly and severally promise to pay to the Farmers' Co-operative Trust Company, or order, thirty-one hundred and ninety-five dollars, with interest; and in case of default of payment at maturity, an additional five per cent for the collection of the same. And we jointly and severally empower any attorney of record in this Commonwealth, or elsewhere, to appear for us, or either of us, and confess judgment against us, or either of us, for the same and accrued interest, together with said five per cent attorneys' fees, with costs of suit, release of errors and without stay of execution. And for value received we jointly and severally do waive the right and benefit severally of any law of this or any State exempting property, real or personal, from sale; and if levy is made on land, we do also jointly and severally waive the right of inquisition, and consent to the condemnation thereof, with full liberty to sell the same on à. fa., with release of errors thereon.

"J. D. Whitham, Treas.

"J. D. Whitham."

"Plaintiff further says that no part of said sum has been paid. Plaintiff says that at the time of the sale of the said wool and the acceptance of said promissory note it had no knowledge of the manner in which said defendants were conducting said business, but relied upon all the members of said association, jointly and severally, for the payment of their said claim. Said plaintiff further says that said Wool Growers' Exchange, as a corporation or association, is wholly insolvent, having no property whatever out of which it can make its said claim, and that the debts against said Wool Growers' Exchange are more than $40,000. Plaintiff says that at the time of the selling of said wool and the issuing of said promissory note as aforesaid all of said defendants were the active business managers of said association, and had full knowledge of the failure of said association, as aforesaid, to obtain and carry into effect a complete charter, and had also full knowledge that the buying or selling of wool was beyond the scope and authority of said pretended corporation as aforesaid. Plaintiff avers that said defendants, J. D. Whitham, R. C. Vance, S. N. Orr and A. C. Ault, did business under their initials, and that plaintiff does not know, and cannot ascertain, their full name. Plaintiff therefore says that said defendants are jointly and severally indebted to said plaintiff in the sum of $3,195, with interest from the 8th day of January, A. D. 1883. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendants, and each of them, for same sum of $3,195, with interest upon the same from the 8th day of January, 1883, and costs of suit."

Hartshorn made default. The other defendants who were served with process demurred generally to the amended petition, and, after the demurrers were overruled, filed a joint answer, controverting all the allegations of the petition except the averment of the plaintiff's incorporation. The plaintiff, upon the trial, obtained a verdict for the full amount claimed in the petition. The court overruled the motion filed by the answering defendants for a new trial, and rendered judgment against them on the verdict, and also rendered judgment against Hartshorn on default for the same amount. A bill of exceptions was duly taken by the defendants, from which it appears that at the trial the parties gave evidence tending to prove, on their respective parts, the issues joined by the pleadings. To enable the plaintiff to recover under the instructions given by the court to the jury, it was necessary for them to find that there had not been subscribed to the capital stock of the Wool Growers' Exchange an amount equal to 10 per cent thereof; that the plaintiff was ignorant of this defect in the incorporation; and that the defendants themselves, or through an agent appointed by them, actually participated in the transaction which the plaintiff set forth in the petition. The burden of establishing these facts, the jury were instructed, was on the plaintiff.

The defendants requested that certain instructions be given to the jury, which, together with the action of the court with respect to them, are set out in the bill of exceptions as follows: "I am requested by counsel to charge the following propositions: 'Proposition 1. If the said Medill, Floyd, Ault and Gault, who have filed a joint answer herein, under all the circumstances of the case, without negligence on their part, believed, and had a good right to believe, that the condition as to the subscription of $5,000 of the capital stock of the Wool Growers' Exchange had been complied with prior to the election of officers, then they are not liable to plaintiff, if the articles of incorporation were duly filed with the secretary of the State of Ohio, and said Wool Growers' Exchange did proceed to carry on, and did carry on, the business for which they were incorporated.' This, gentlemen, I refuse to charge. Mere belief is not sufficient. I am also requested by defendants to charge as follows: 'Proposition 2. If you are satisfied from the evidence in this case that the defendants answering in this case, knowingly, and with the design to defraud the public generally, combined together and held forth false and deceptive colors, and did acts which are wrong, and have thereby injured the plaintiff, they must make him whole by responding to the full extent of that injury, and the Act of incorporation in such case, when the same is defective, and the organization thereunder was effected without the requisite amount of stock subscribed, will not protect the defendants from such liability. But if, on the contrary, you are satisfied from the evidence that the said defendants, in good faith and without negligence, proceeded to the organization of the corporation, and thereafter carried on business as a corporation in good faith, believing and having cause to believe that the requisite amount of stock had been subscribed, and that the corporation was otherwise regularly organized, then, and in such case, the Act of incorporation will protect them from personal liability in this action to the plaintiff, although in fact it should now turn out that the organization was effected when less than the requisite amount of stock had been subscribed.' This I refuse. Actual fraud on the part of the defendants is not essential to the case of the plaintiff, nor will good faith and sincere belief alone afford a shield."

The defendants excepted to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested by them, and also excepted generally to the charge given; and those of them against whom judgment was rendered (except Hartshorn, who, refusing to join as a plaintiff in error, was made a party defendant) prosecuted error to the circuit court, where the judgment was reversed upon the following grounds, as stated in the journal entry: "First. The court of common pleas erred in overruling the separate demurrers of plaintiffs in error to the amended petition of defendant in error, the Farmers' Co-operative Trust Company. Second. The court of common pleas erred in refusing to give the propositions numbered one and two of the request of the plaintiffs in error to the jury, as requested by plaintiffs in error, and in the charge as given by the court to the jury so far as inconsistent with said requests."

It is sought by the present proceeding in error to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, and have that of the common pleas affirmed.

Messrs. John M. Cook, Estep & Estep and A. H. Batten, for plaintiff in error:

The subscribing of 10 per cent of the capital stock was a condition precedent to the commencement of the business by the association, and if 10 per cent was not subscribed, these parties, defendants in error, who conducted the business, made themselves individually responsible for all liabilities incurred, and the question of fraud had nothing to do with it.

If there was a corporation by the issuing of the certificate, it was a lifeless thing until the 10 per cent or $5,000 was subscribed.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The circuit court, it appears from the record, reversed the judgment of the court of common pleas because of alleged errors in overruling the demurrers to the amended petition, and refusing the instructions which the defendants requested to be given to the jury. It sufficiently appears from the petition that in 1878 the defendants attempted to form, under the laws of this State, a corporation called the "Wool Growers' Exchange," for the purpose, as declared in the articles of incorporation, of dealing in "wool, merchandise, produce, and furnishing supplies to wool-growers and others, on commission and purchase or sale, and to do a general commission business in the articles above enumerated; and also for the purpose of disseminating, through bureaus or journals, useful knowledge and information pertaining to the improvement and protection of wool-growing interests." The amount of the capital stock was fixed at $50,000, in shares of $10 each. When less than $8,000 of stock had been subscribed, and less than $2,000 paid in, an election was held by the defendants and others, at which the defendants were chosen as directors of the concern. These directors organized by selecting from their number the customary officers of a corporation. Thereafter, in 1883, while the defendants, against whom the judgment in the case was rendered, were acting as such directors, controlling and managing the business of the Wool Growers' Exchange, wool was purchased in its name from the plaintiff to the amount averred in the petition; and the balance, $3,195, of the purchase price, for which, with interest, the plaintiff recovered judgment, remains unpaid. The defendants had knowledge that 10 per cent of the stock of the corporation had not been, and never was, subscribed or paid in, but the plaintiff was ignorant of that fact. There is no allegation in the petition that the defendants were actuated by any fraudulent purpose, or had any design to cheat or defraud the plaintiff. Without such purpose or design, it is claimed that the defendants could not be made liable, and therefore the lack of such averment is a fatal defect in the petition. Whether it be so or not is the question raised by the demurrers. The instructions refused present a question somewhat different in form, though much of the same nature, which is, whether a personal liability was incurred by the defendants if in the transaction with the plaintiff they acted in good faith, believing that the requisite amount of stock to authorize the organization of the corporation had been subscribed.

Upon both questions the circuit court held with the defendants, and if its holding upon either was correct, its judgment must be affirmed. A somewhat extended examination has satisfied us, however, that upon neither is the decision in harmony with the great weight of authority. The courts of this country and of England, with few exceptions, adhere to the doctrine so clearly laid down by Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Law of Agency, where it is said: "Wherever a party undertakes to do any act as the agent of another, if he do not possess any authority from the principal therefor, or if he exceeds the authority delegated to him, he will be personally responsible therefor to the person with whom he is dealing for or on account of his principal. There can be no doubt that this is, and ought to be, the rule of law in the case of a fraudulent representation made by the agent, that he has due authority to act for the principal; for it is an intentional deceit. The same rule may justly apply where the agent has no such authority, and he knows it, and he nevertheless undertakes to act for the principal, although he intends no fraud. But another case may be put, which may seem to admit of more doubt; and that is, where the party undertakes to act as an agent for the principal, bona fide, believing that he has due authority, but in point of fact he has no authority, and therefore he acts under an innocent mistake. In this last case, however, the agent is held by law to be equally as responsible as he is in the two former cases, although he is guilty of no intentional fraud or moral turpitude. This whole doctrine proceeds upon a plain principle of justice; for every person so acting for another, by a natural, if not by a necessary, implication, holds himself out as having competent authority to do the act; and he thereby draws the other party into a reciprocal engagement. . . . If he has no such authority, and acts bona fide, still he does a wrong to the other party; and if that wrong produces an injury to the latter, owing to his confidence in the truth of an express or implied assertion of authority by the agent, it is perfectly just that he who makes such an assertion should be personally responsible for the consequences, rather than that the injury should be borne by the other party, who has been misled by it. Indeed, it is a plain principle of equity, as well as of law, that where one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss, he ought to bear it who has been the sole means of producing it, by inducing the other to place a false confidence in his acts, and to repose upon the truth of his statements." Story, Ag. § 264. In the note to this section many cases which sustain the text are cited. And in the notes to Thomson v. Davenport, in 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. pt. 1, commencing on page 408 of the eighth edition, a number of the cases on the same subject are collected. In addition to those, other cases might be referred to, among them the following: Walker v. Bank of State, 9 N. Y. 582; White v. Madison, 26 N. Y. 117; Weare v. Gove, 44 N. H. 196.

In the last case cited above it is held that, "although no fraud or wrongful motive can be imputed to the agent, still his act is an affirmation that he has authority to make the contract, and he may justly be held responsible for the truth of it; and it is no more than reasonable that he should suffer the consequences of his mistake rather than the party who is misled by it, because, before holding himself out as such agent, it is his duty to ascertain whether his claim so to act is well founded or not; and he surely cannot be heard to complain that others have confided in his assertion of authority, and upon the strength of it have entered into reciprocal engagements with him. Even if wholly innocent of any wrongful purpose, his case falls within the familiar principle that when one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss it ought to be borne by him who has been the means of causing it, by inducing the other to confide in the truth of his representations."

While, however, the authorities generally agree that where a person, not having in fact authority to make a contract as agent, yet does so under the bona fide belief that such authority is vested in him, is nevertheless personally responsible to those who contract with him in ignorance of his want of authority, a diversity of opinion is found in the cases in regard to the exact nature of the liability, and the character of the action by which it may be enforced.

In Jenkins v. Hutchinson, 18 Q. B. 746, it is intimated by Erle, J., that an action of deceit would lie in such cases, notwithstanding the good faith of the agent, and some authorities may be found to that effect. Another class of cases hold that the liability is upon the contract; but it is believed that whether the agent is so liable depends upon the intention of the parties as discovered from the contract itself; and on this question the form of the agreement and the mode of signature may be quite conclusive. The rule, as stated in Story on Agency, is that an agent cannot be sued on the very instrument itself, as a contracting party, unless there be apt words to charge him. Section 264a. Still another class of cases establish the rule, which we are inclined to adopt, that in cases like the one we are considering the agent is liable upon his implied promise that he possesses the authority he assumes to have. 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. pt. 1, p. 408, and cases there cited; Lewis v. Nicholson 18 Q. B. 512. In White v. Madison, supra, in a learned opinion, it is held that the liability of the agent in such cases rests upon the ground that he warrants his authority, and not that the contract is to be deemed his own. Bartholomew v. Bentley, 15 Ohio, 660, is referred to as establishing both that the liability of the agent in cases of this kind is founded on fraud and that the petition should charge a fraudulent intent in direct terms. That was an action in case for deceit, under the practice which prevailed before the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure. The questions arising upon the demurrer related to the form of the remedy and the sufficiency of the declaration in such an action. They are stated by Birchard, J., to be: "First. Can a special action on the case for fraud, which has resulted in damage of the plaintiffs, be maintained in a case like this, upon sufficient declaration? Second. Is this declaration good upon demurrer?" The court answers the first question in the affirmative, and in speaking of the declaration says: "The objection taken by counsel is a want of certainty. The action is founded on a fraudulent combination, and for holding out false colors at the commencement of the banking operations, and at various subsequent periods. The only direct charge of a fraudulent intention is in the withdrawal of the funds, and this, for aught that appears, may have been long since the bills in plaintiff's hands were issued. . . . It is thought that the averment of a fraudulent design should have been made in positive terms, as to each specific act relied upon to sustain the action." Under the practice then in force, pleadings were subject to demurrer unless they were appropriate in their form and allegations to the particular action pursued; and we do not understand it to be there decided that no other action could be maintained on the facts of that case. A different action was maintained in Medill v. Collier, 16 Ohio St. 599, which, so far as the grounds upon which the liability of the bank directors was placed, is not greatly dissimilar to the case before us.

not important what was formerly the most appropriate remedy. Upon the facts stated in the petition, the law, we think, implied a promise on the part of the defendants that in making the contract with the plaintiff they had authority to bind the corporation they assumed to represent; and if they had not, they are answerable for the consequences. That they were without such authority seems clear. It was held by this court in Bartholomew v. Bentley, 1 Ohio St. 87, that while mere irregularities in organizing a corporation would not subject the officers to private liability, to protect them from such liability the provisions of the Act of incorporation must be substantially pursued. By our statutes, under which the proceedings were taken for the formation of the corporation referred to in the petition, the corporate powers, business and property of corporations formed for profit must be exercised, conducted and controlled by a board of directors, all of whom must be stockholders; the articles of association must state the amount of the capital stock, and the number of shares into which it is divided; and at least 10 per cent of that amount must be subscribed before directors can be chosen. So that the subscription of the necessary amount of the capital stock to authorize the election of directors is not only a matter of substance, but is essential to the organization of the corporation, and necessary to the transaction of business by it. It is the security which the law requires shall be provided, before the corporation enters upon its business, for the protection of those who may deal with it. The statutory liability of the stock subscribers is an additional security. In the effort to form the corporation in question neither of these securities was provided. Counsel contend that it is nevertheless a corporation de facto, and estopped to deny its liability to the plaintiff. If it were, it is not readily perceived how this would aid the defendants. Until there were stock subscriptions to an amount warranting the organization, the subscribers could not be compelled to pay beyond the sum required at the time of the subscription; nor would the statutory liability attach, unless there were some ground of estoppel, not appearing in this case. The implied undertaking of the defendants was, that they represented a corporation with the capital stock required by law; while the one to which they insist the plaintiff shall be compelled to resort was, if a de facto corporation, so only in name, without substance or capacity; and if the doctrine of estoppel could be brought to the aid of the plaintiff against it, the defendants are not in a position to require a resort to that remedy to relieve them from the liability they have incurred.

The case appears to have proceeded in the trial court upon the theory that, if the defendants were liable at all, the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover was the balance due on the contract. This was not necessarily the measure of recovery. As we have already seen, the action in such cases is not founded on the contract made for the supposed principal, but on the implied promise of the agent that he had authority to bind the principal; and the damages which may be recovered for its breach is the loss sustained by the plaintiff by reason of his not having the valid contract which the agent undertook that he should have. The damages may sometimes exceed the amount due on the contract made in the name of the principal, for it is held they may include the costs and expenses of an unsuccessful action against the principal to enforce the contract. White v. Madison, supra; Simons v. Patchett, 7 El. & Bl. 568; Collen v. Wright, Id. 301, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 410.

In Morawetz on Corporations it is said that the measure of damages, in an action against the directors or officers of a corporation who induce a person to deal with it before the capital indicated in its charter has in fact been provided, is the loss sustained "by reason of the difference between the capital which he actually received, and that which he was entitled to expect." Under this rule, we think, the plaintiff might properly recover the balance remaining unpaid on the purchase price of the wool sold. Prima facie, that is the amount of the plaintiff's loss, and it does not exceed the amount of the capital which the corporation was required by law to have before it could be represented by directors, and which the defendants, by assuming to act for it, undertook that it did have.

It is true the petition alleges that the corporation is insolvent, with an indebtedness exceeding 10 per cent of the capital stock; but whether the claims of other creditors stand upon a like footing with that of the plaintiff, or can or will be enforced against the defendants, does not appear. Besides, if the proper stock subscriptions had been obtained, the corporation might not have become insolvent; or before it did, the plaintiff's claim might have been paid or secured. If in such case the plaintiff could recover no more than a sum equal to the proportion of the capital which should have been provided that his claim bears to the whole indebtedness contracted in the corporate name, it would be necessary to take an account of the assets and liabilities to determine the amount of the recovery. That rule applied to this case would require that the defendants be charged with an amount equal to the necessary stock subscriptions and the statutory liability of the subscribers, and that all the creditors be brought in to have their claims adjusted before the amount of the verdict could be arrived at. The plaintiff has not sought to compel the defendants to provide a fund for the payment of other creditors who are not themselves asserting their claims, nor have the defendants complained because they were not compelled to do so. Whether the defendants could in the trial court, if they had deemed it to their advantage, have had the claims of all the creditors adjusted, the aggregate liabilities ascertained, and the total amount the defendants could be called upon to pay determined and apportioned among the creditors, we need not decide. They did not make that claim in the court below, nor do they make it here. In our opinion, the court of common pleas committed no error in overruling the demurrers to the petition, nor in refusing the instructions requested by the defendants.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and that of the Court of Common Pleas affirmed.

Almon Bartlett,
c.

George S. SMITH.

(39 Conn. 354.)

1. A probate judge cited by the probate judge of another district to act in his place, who acts with the assent of the clerk, is a judge de jure, although the statute prescribes that the "clerk of the court shall cite" the judge in such cases, as that provision is merely directory.
2. The most satisfactory and conclusive test of the question whether or not the provisions of a statute are mandatory or directory is whether the prescribed mode of action is of the essence of the thing to be accomplished, in other words, whether it relates to matters material or immaterial, to matters of convenience or of substance.
3. Evidence that no witnesses were sworn or hearing had before a probate judge, as stated in the records of the probate court, is inadmissible.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. S. Lucas, C. F. Thayer and G. E. Parsons, for appellant:

A plaintiff who sues as trustee must prove a legal appointment to such office when his right to sue in that capacity is put in issue; and he cannot avail himself of the de facto doctrine in aid of his appointment when the defective title of the appointing power is matter of public record, or when he has set the appointing power in motion for his own advantage.

Powers v. Mulvey, 51 Conn. 433; Mourry v. Hawkins, 57 Conn. 453.

The Statute provides for the organization of a new tribunal when the probate judge is disqualified, which, when organized, shall have power to affect the rights and property of the citizen; and such a power can only be acquired by a strict compliance with statutory requirements. This makes the Statute mandatory.

Loomis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant, as trustee of the insolvent estate of Almon Bartlett, seeks to recover, for the benefit of creditors, the value of certain personal property belonging to the insolvent's estate, which, it is alleged, the defendant wrongfully took and converted to his own use.

It is conceded that the defendant, having taken the property, knowing that Bartlett was in failing circumstances, to apply on a pre-existing debt due from Bartlett to him, cannot withhold it from the plaintiff if he is rightfully acting as trustee. The defendant's contention is mandatory and must be substantially followed. Wheaton v. Peters, 38 U. S. 3 Pet. 591, 8 L. ed. 1055; Jollie v. Jaques, 1 Blatchf. 618; Baker v. Taylor, 2 Blatchf. 62; *Newton v. Where power is given to public officers, whenever public or individual right calls for its exercise, the language used, though permissive in form, is in fact peremptory. that the plaintiff is not a lawful trustee for the alleged reason that the court which appointed him was illegally constituted.

The facts appear from the records of the probate District of Montville, which were admitted in evidence against the defendant's objection, to prove that the plaintiff was a lawful trustee to take possession of the property of Bartlett. These records showed a regular petition to the court by Loren H. Gallup, as creditor of the insolvent, in due form praying for the appointment of a trustee to take possession of the property of Bartlett for the benefit of his creditors as provided by statute, and an order of notice by the court thereon fixing the date of hearing the petition, made by the regular judge of the probate court. But before the day appointed by the court for the hearing, Comstock, the regularly appointed judge, had been consulted as counsel in matters growing out of the estate, and he thereupon and for that reason declined to act further in the matter, and cited in Judge A. O. Gallup, the lawful probate judge of the adjoining district of Salem, by sending him a letter signed by the court asking him to act as judge of the Court of Probate for the District of Montville in the matter,—all of which was made a matter of record and signed by Comstock, the regular judge. The judge of the adjoining district, in obedience to the citation, held the court in the Montville District on the day appointed, and after a full hearing found the allegations of the petition true, and that Bartlett had failed to satisfy the claim of the petitioning creditor, and therefore granted the prayer of the petition and decreed Bartlett insolvent, and appointed the plaintiff trustee in due form, and he proceeded with the settlement of the estate.

The only thing relied upon by the defendant to invalidate the plaintiff's appointment as trustee is the simple fact that the judge of the adjoining district held the court pursuant to a citation by the judge of the Montville District, rather than by the clerk. It is found, however, that the latter was present during all the proceedings on the part of the judge so cited in, and it was not claimed that the clerk had designated any other judge to hold the court or made the least objection to any of the proceedings.

The defendant appeals to the language of the Statute to support his position, which provides that "when any judge of probate shall decline or be disqualified to act as such judge, or shall be unable to discharge his duties, or when the office of judge of probate in any district shall become vacant, the clerk of the court of probate of the district in which such disqualification, inability or vacancy exists . . . shall cite in the judge of probate of an adjoining district, etc."

The force of the argument in behalf of the defendant depends entirely upon the assumption that the above Statute is mandatory and not directory merely, and that therefore the

The words "may," "shall" and "must."

In a direction to a public body in a matter in which the public have an interest, as, that a bridge may be maintained by the county, the word "may" means "must." Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road v. Miller, 5 Johns. Ch. 113, 1 L. ed. 1027; Malcolm v. Rogers, 5 Cow. 183; Phelps v. Hawley, 52 N. Y. 23; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297; Schuyler County Suprs. v. People, 25 Ill. 181; Sheckert v. East Saginaw, 22 Mich. 104.

A statute providing that a tax certificate may be of a certain form, the word "may" was held equivalent to "shall" and is mandatory. Clark v. Schatz, 24 Minn. 300; Keller v. Houlihan, 32 Minn. 496; Wilberforce, Statute Law, 204.

When a statute directs the performance of an act for the promotion of justice or the public good, if it is necessary to secure these objects, the word "may" will be construed as mandatory. Johnston v. Pate, 95 N. C. 68. See Rex v. Barlow, 2 Salk. 600; Coy v. Lyons City Council, 17 Iowa, 1; Clark County Justices v. Paris, W. & T. R. Co. 11 B. Mon. 143; Baltimore v. S. 9 How. 248; 13 L. ed. 125; Rock Island County Suprs. v. United States, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 485, 18 L. ed. 419; Galena v. United States, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 705, 18 L. ed. 500.

The word "shall" or "may" when used in a statute is imperative only when public interest or rights are concerned. Malcom v. Rogers, 5 Cow. 188.

The word "may" when used instead of "shall," in a statute prescribing the duty of an officer, ordinarily imports a duty that is directory; but when the public interest is concerned, or the rights of third persons are affected, the words are construed to mean the same thing. Smith v. King, 14 Or. 10.

"May" means "must" in all cases where the Legislature means to impose a positive instead of a discretionary power. Minor v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 46, 7 L. ed. 47. See note to People v. Bloomington Twp. Highway Comrs. (Ill.) 6 L. R. A. 162.

precise mode prescribed must be pursued. But if we apply to the Statute the most approved tests established by high authority we shall see that the assumption is not well founded.

In the first place the provision in question contains mere matter of direction and there are no negative words importing that the act must be done by the clerk rather than by the court. This was the test laid down in Pearse v. Morrice, 2 Ad. & El. 96; Rea v. St. Gregory, Id. 99; Rea v. Hipswell, 8 Barn. & C. 466; Stayton v. Huisinga, 7 Ind. 144, and in Bladen v. Philadelphia, 60 Pa. 464.

In People v. Cook, 14 Barb. 290, which was approved by the Court of Appeals in 8 N. Y. 67, the rule was laid down that "statutes directing the mode of proceeding by public officers are directory, and are not regarded as essential to the validity of the proceedings themselves, unless it be so declared in the statute."

In Voazie v. China, 50 Me. 518, it is said: "Where words are affirmative, and relate to the manner in which power or jurisdiction vested in a public officer or body is to be exercised, and not to the limits of the power or jurisdiction itself, they may and often have been construed to be directory."

In People v. Schermerhorn, 19 Barb. 558, it was held that "statutory requisitions are deemed directory when they relate to some immaterial matter, where compliance is a matter of convenience rather than of substance."

Whether the word "may" is permissive or obligatory depends upon the intent and object of the Legislature. It means "must" when third persons or the public have an interest in the performance of the act. Hains v. Herring, 68 Tex. 468, citing Newburg & C. Turnp. Road v. Miller, 5 Johns. Ch. 113, 1 L. ed. 1087; Malcom v. Rogers, supra; Sedgwick Stat. and Const. L. 434.

Permissive words in statute.

Whether words when used in a statute are merely permissive or imperative depends on the intention as disclosed in the nature of the act, and in the context. Minor v. Mechanics Bank of Alexandria, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 46, 7 L. ed. 47; Lewis v. State, 8 Head, 127; 1 Kent, Com. 463.

Where a statute confers power on a corporation to be exercised for the public good, the words "power and authority" and "authorized and empowered" imply duty and obligation and are mandatory. Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160; Alleghany County Pub. School Comra. v. Alleghany County, 20 Md. 449; People v. Herkimer County Supra, 56 Barb. 452; Barnes v. Thompson, 2 Swan, 317.

Permissive words in respect to courts or officers are imperative in those cases in which the public or individuals have a right that the power so conferred be exercised. Tarver v. Tallapoosa Comra. Ct. 17 Ala. 527; Mitchell v. Duncan, 7 Fla. 13; Reg. v. Adamson, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 201.

They will be construed as mandatory for the purpose of sustaining and enforcing rights, but not for creating a right or determining its character; they are peremptory when used to clothe a public officer with power to do an act for justice's sake or which concerns the public interests or rights of third persons. Re Banks, 28 Ala. 28; Rex v. Barlow, 2 Salk. 609; Johnston v. Pate, 36 N. C. 68; Sutherland, Stat. Const. 587.

But statutes which are permissive in form, or which declare that it shall be lawful to do or procure to be done certain things, are not imperative. Sutherland, Stat. Const. 593, citing Minor v. Me- 12 L. R. A.

Lord Mansfield, in Rea v. Loadale, 1 Burr. 445, made the question whether a statute should be considered mandatory or not depend upon "whether that which was directed to be done was or was not of the essence of the thing required." A similar principle was adopted in this State in Thames Mfg. Co. v. Lathrop, 7 Conn. 550, and in Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 243, both cases relating to the time specified in statutes for the performance of a required act. In the former the town clerk was required under a penalty to return an abstract of the assessment list of the town to the comptroller by the first day of March. In the latter case a city charter required that a certain number of jurors should be chosen on the first Monday of July, and they were not chosen until the eighth day of August. In both cases it was held that, as there was nothing to indicate that the exact time specified in the statute was essential, it should be considered merely as directory.

All the rules to which we have adverted are consistent with and furnish some support for the position that the Statute under consideration is merely directory.

It is of course difficult to lay down a general rule to determine in all cases when the provisions of a statute are merely directory and when mandatory or imperative, but, of all the rules mentioned, the test most satisfactory and conclusive is, whether the prescribed mode of action is of the essence of the thing to be ac-

Protection of personal and property rights.

Statutory requirements intended for the protection of the citizen and to prevent a sacrifice of his property are not directory, but mandatory. The power of the officer in such cases is limited by the manner and conditions prescribed for its exercise. French v. Edwards, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 506, 20 L. ed. 702. See Clark v. Crane, 5 Mich. 154.

A requirement of the statute can never be dispensed with as directory where the act or its omission can by any possibility work injury, however slight, to anyone affected by it. Koch v. Bridges, 45 Miss. 247.

Where a statutory power or jurisdiction is granted, whether to a court or to an officer, in the exercise of which one may be divested of his property, the provisions regulating the procedure are mandatory as to the essential acts. Potter's Dwar. Stat. 224.

So every material requirement of the laws for condemning private property must be strictly observed. Kroop v. Forman, 31 Mich. 144; Bennett v. Olney, 56 Mich. 684; People v. Hillsdale & C. Turnp. Co. 2 Johns. 192.

Statutes providing for commitments to the custody of state lunatic hospitals are to be strictly followed. Leggate v. Clark, 111 Mass. 308; Chase v. Hathaway, 14 Mass. 222; Leonard v. Leonard, 14 Pick. 280.

What the law requires to be done for the protection of the taxpayer is mandatory. Clark v. Crane, 5 Mich. 154; Marsh v. Chesnut, 14 Ill. 223; Torrey v. Millbury, 21 Pick. 67; Sibley v. Smith, 2 Mich. 486.

Under provisions in a statute intended for the protection of the citizen, and to prevent a sacrifice of his property, the power of the officer is limited by the measure and conditions prescribed for its exercise. French v. Edwards, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 506, 20 L. ed. 702. See generally Walker v. Chapman, 23 complished, or, in other words, whether it relates to matter material or immaterial—to matter of convenience or of substance.

The thing to be accomplished in this case was to obtain a probate judge from some district adjoining Montville, in order to continue the proceedings legally commenced and pending in the Probate Court of Montville. To accomplish this the judge of the adjoining district should be informed if possible by someone directly connected with the court in the other district, of the exigency that had arisen, and that his presence and official assistance were desired; but whether asked to attend by the court or by the clerk of the court would seem about as immaterial as whether he would take one road or another or one vehicle or another to get there.

There is, however, one reason urged by the defendant for a strict compliance with the statutory requisition which deserves consideration, for, if true, we would be unwilling to pronounce the Statute merely directory. The reason alleged is, that the clerk was mentioned because the law was unwilling, so to speak, to trust a disqualified judge with the selection of another judge to take his place. There would be some force in this suggestion if the disqualified judge could substitute any person of his own choice; but the choice is limited by law to the judges of the adjoining probate districts—all duly qualified public officers, elected by the people of their respective districts to perform the same judicial duties that are required of them in the districts to which they may be invited. It is impossible that the law should apprehend danger to be guarded against from a choice among these officials. Should there happen to be in a given case a personal disqualification, such an one would of course be set aside upon general principles. It would seem impossible that injury should result from a choice by a disqualified judge, when he cannot choose any but qualified judges to try the case, whom the law must regard as equally well qualified.

And besides, the clerk to whom, as the defendant contends, the law has exclusively committed the selection, might also have a personal interest in the same matter, but of which, strangely enough, the law takes no account at all, as it would if it was so scrupulously guarding against such a danger.

If the purpose of the law in the case under consideration is as claimed, our statutes in analogous cases are all strangely defective and inconsistent. By section 678 of the General Statutes, a justice of the peace, disqualified to try a case before him, can designate some other justice to act in his stead; and by section 745 of the Statutes, when a judge of the court of common pleas is unable or disqualified to act, he may himself call in, or in his absence the clerk of the court may call in, another judge. In the long time that these provisions have

Tax Laws.

Statutory provisions regulating the assessment and levy of taxes are mandatory when their object is the protection of the taxpayer; but regulations intended to promote dispatch, method, system and uniformity in modes of proceeding are merely directory. 1 Desty, Taxn. 515.

Provisions of statute, when directory.

A clause in a statute is directory when the provisions contain mere matter of direction, and no more; but not when they are followed by words of positive prohibition. Re Casick's App. 10 L. R. A. 223, 126 Pa. 459; Pearse v. Morrice, 2 Ad. & El. 94, 12 L. R. A.

Some cases hold that whether a statute is directory or not depends upon whether the act shall be done in a particular manner or time and not otherwise (Stayton v. Hulings, 7 Ind. 144; Rex v. St. Gregory, 2 Ad. & El. 99); but this rule as to the use or non-use of negative words is by no means general. Dubuque Dist. Twp. v. Dubuque, 7 Iowa, 284.

A law which directs a particular act to be performed, but which does not imperatively command it, as a condition precedent to anything further, is directory only. See generally Wiley v. Flournoy, 39 Ark. 609; Milner v. Clarke, 61 Ala. 253; State Auditor v. Jackson County, 65 Ala. 142; Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 609; Adams v. Seymour, 30 Conn. 402; *Silsbee v. The provisions of a law which are merely directory are not to be construed into conditions precedent. Whitney v. Emmett, 1 Bald. 303.

An Act of Incorporation, by which the president and directors are "empowered and directed to enter into reasonable agreements with the proprietors" of the land to be used, cannot be taken as mandatory on the company, but contemplates a voluntary agreement. Binney v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 201, 8 L. ed. 917.

Provisions are directory where they relate to some immaterial matter not of the essence of the thing to be done, and where a departure from the statute will cause no injury to any person affected by it. McKune v. Weller, 11 Cal. 49; Best v. Gholson, 39 Ill. 465; Clark v. Crane, 5 Mich. 151; Hurford v. Omaha, 4 Neb. 333; Marah v. Chesnut, 14 Ill. 223; Norwegian Street, 81 Pa. 349; *State v. been in operation no mischief has ever been disclosed calling for a remedy, and we do not believe the provision in the Probate Law under consideration was inserted on account of any evil resulting or anticipated from allowing one judge to cite in another to act in his stead. The requirement under consideration is not a material one for the reason alleged and no other reason has been suggested.

Is it, then, arbitrarily prescribed as one essential qualification of the substituted judge that he should be cited in in a particular manner? What virtue can there be in the mere citation, other than to signify to him from a responsible source that he is wanted, and induce him to come? We believe the prescribed notice or citation is a mere matter of convenience and not at all a matter of substance.

A brief history of our legislation on this subject will furnish further support for this position. In the several revisions of our statutes, from 1821 to 1866 inclusive, will be found only a general provision that "in case a judge of probate shall be disqualified, the judge of any adjoining district may act in his stead," with no provision whatever for citing him in—thus distinguishing and pointing out the matter of substance, while considering the rest so immaterial as that it might be safely left to the mere discretion of the judge or clerk or some party interested in the pending litigation.

The requirement under consideration (so far as the Revised Statutes are concerned) first appears in the Revision of 1876, where it probably originated, as we are unable to find it from a somewhat hurried examination of the Session Laws prior to that time. The principal object of the change, we think, was to promote the convenience of the judge to be cited, and to assure him that the call to act came from a responsible source directly connected with the court. Under the present law no duty to act will be imposed on the judge of the adjoining district unless he shall be cited in in the manner prescribed, but he may waive the formality, and if he does so, he may act upon less formal notice with the consent of the clerk and the court, and if he does so, his acts become those of a judge de jure, and no one has a right to complain. This conclusion renders unnecessary any decision of the interesting questions discussed by counsel relative to the application of the de facto doctrine.

In the argument before this court, counsel for the defendant objected to certain amendments that had been made to the original record by the acting probate judge, and asked this court to hold, as matter of law, that the alterations were no part of the record. If such a question was properly before us it would be obviously difficult to comply with any such request, but it will suffice to say that in the court below the finding is very explicit that the defendant's objection to the records in question was upon the sole ground that the acting judge of the probate court had been cited in to hold the court by the judge of the court, instead of by the clerk as required by the literal terms of the Statute, so that this was the only question respecting the records brought before us for review.

One other question only, raised in the court below and decided adversely to the defendant, remains for our consideration. The finding states the question as follows: "The defendant also offered evidence that no witnesses were sworn or hearing had before said A. O. Gallup" (the acting judge) "on July 30, 1889, as stated in the records of the probate court, to which the plaintiff objected, and the court excluded said evidence."

The facts offered to be proved did not attack the jurisdiction of the court, but its irregular mode of proceeding, and under the common-law rule the records of the probate court as to all material facts except jurisdictional ones, necessarily made a part of it and upon which the judgment depends, import absolute verity. But without the common law, the prohibition contained in section 436 of the General Statutes, that "no order or decree of a court of probate shall be attacked collaterally except for fraud, or set aside save by appeal," would preclude the defendant from offering such evidence.

There was no error in the judgment complained of.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (3d Div.).

Constance B. PRICE

v.

Walter J. PRICE et al.

(....N. Y....).

1. No dower right exists in favor of a woman whose marriage was annulled because the husband had a wife living, although she had not been heard from within five years before the second marriage, which was contracted by both parties in good faith, and was therefore valid under 2 Rev. Stat., 189, § 6, until its nullity was pronounced by a court.

2. The express denial of dower in New York statutes, where a divorce is granted for the wife's adultery, does not by implication give dower in case of annulment of a marriage made in good faith, because the husband had a former wife living.

CROSS-APPEALS from judgments of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment entered in the office of the Clerk of New York County, upon the report of a referee dismissing the bill which was filed to secure the admeasurement of dower in the estate of Walter W. Price, deceased, and allowing and admeasuring such dower. Reversed.

Statement by Follett, Ch. J.:

Cross-appeals from an interlocutory and final judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, awarding dower to the plaintiff. April 23, 1889, Walter W. Price and Susanna Butler intermarried in England, and lived together, as husband and wife, at Birmingham, for about one year, when he came to the United States, where he resided until his death. July 1, 1865, Price and Constance Bridget Tallon, the plaintiff in this action, intermarried at the City of New York, and lived together as husband and wife until July, 1871, having two children born unto them, who survive. In May, 1873, Price began an action in the supreme court of this State to have his last marriage annulled, on the ground that his first wife was then living, which resulted in a judgment entered April 15, 1874, annulling the marriage. The court found that the first wife, Susanna, had absented herself from her husband since 1848, had not been heard of by him for more than five years, and that the marriage between Walter W. Price and Constance B. Tallon was contracted in good faith, believing that his former wife was dead. It was adjudged that their marriage was null and void, but "only from the time that its nullity is hereby pronounced, to wit, from and after the date of this judgment." It was further adjudged that the children of the marriage were legitimate, and entitled to succeed in the same manner as legitimate children to the real and personal estate of the father and mother, or either of them. At the date of the entry of this judgment Walter W. Price owned the real estate described in the interlocutory judgment in this action, about fourteen acres of which he conveyed in July, 1875, to Walter J. Price. June 6, 1876, Walter W. Price died seized of all of said real estate except that so conveyed, which he disposed of by will. This action was begun by the plaintiff, June 7, 1880, to have dower admeasured in the real estate of which Walter W. Price was seized at the date of the entry of the judgment annulling the marriage. The defendants are the devisee, grantees and mortgagees of the devisees of Walter W. Price. They set up in their answers, among other defenses, (1) that the marriage was null and void, and had been so adjudged; (2) that February 25, 1874, the plaintiff received from Walter W. Price a sum of money in satisfaction of all claims to dower in his property.

Messrs. Charles Jones and George H. Starr, for plaintiff:

Dower "is a title inchoate and not consummate till the death of the husband, but it is an interest which attaches on the land as soon as there is the concurrence of marriage and seisin."

4 Kent, Com. 50.

The marriage between the plaintiff and Walter W. Price is valid.

Valleau v. Valleau, 6 Paige, 207, 3 L. ed. 957; Whits v. Lowe, 1 Redf. 376; Cropsey v. McKinney, 80 Barb. 47; Griffin v. Banks, 24 How. Pr. 218; Roderigas v. East River Sav. Inst. 63 N. Y. 460; Brouer v. Bowers, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 214.

The supreme court has held that a widow of such a marriage is entitled to dower in the estate of the husband.

Jones v. Zoller, 29 Hun, 551, 32 Hun, 280; Price v. Price, 33 Hun, 76; Jones v. Fleming, 37 Hun, 227.

The marriage of the plaintiff with Walter W. Price being valid, and she being his lawful wife, had dowerable capacity, and her dower right or title was an interest which "attached on the land" of which her husband was seised during the coverture.

4 Kent, Com. 50; Wait v. Wait, 4 N. Y. 95; Steele v. Ward, 80 Hun, 557.

The plaintiff has never been barred or divested of the dower right or interest which attached to the lands by virtue of marriage and seisin.

The statute prescribes the cases and the manner in which the wife may be barred or divested of her inchoate right of dower and of dower.

1 Rev. Stat. title 8, § 740.

She cannot be barred or divested of this interest or estate in any other way.

Wait v. Wait, supra; People v. Faber, 92 N. Y. 149.

In case of a divorce by which the marriage was dissolved, dower was not barred or divested unless the divorce was for the misconduct of the wife, here meaning her adultery.

Schiffer v. Pruden, 64 N. Y. 47.

Mr. James R. Marvin, for defendant Josephine Little:

A divorce at common law avoided the marriage ab initio. "It was equivalent to a sentence of nullity under our Statute. It placed the parties in the same relation to each other as though there had been no marriage."

Wait v. Wait, 4 N. Y. 100; 2 Kent, Com. 78; Williamson v. Parisien, 1 Johns. Ch. 393, 1 L. ed. 184; Fenton v. Reed, 4 Johns. 52.

The marriage in question was a voidable marriage. The plaintiff was the wife of Price de facto only. Dower attaches to such a marriage provided it exists at the death of the husband.

4 Kent, Com. 36; Co. Litt. 33 b, 32 a; 1 Bl. Com. 434, note; Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 57; Burger v. Hill, 1 Bradf. 376; 1 Williams, Exrs. 358; 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 198; 1 Scribner, Dower, p. 109; Wait v. Wait, 4 Barb. 202.

The divorce in the case at bar was a vinculo matrimonii.

Such a divorce "bars the claim for dower, for to entitle the party claiming dower she must have been the wife at the death of the husband."

4 Kent, Com. § 53, 54; 2 Bl. Com. 180, note a.

The Legislature never intended to give the plaintiff dower in the lands of Price, and at the same time deny to the children of the marriage the right to inherit the same property.

A second marriage in the lifetime of a former wife is also prohibited by the Statute.

At common law a voidable marriage could not be attacked collaterally in the absence of a decree of nullity; but if its nullity was adjudged during the lifetime of the parties, by the decree it became a void marriage, and was therefore void ab initio.

Jaques v. Public Administrator, 1 Bradf. 499; Finn v. Finn, 62 How. Pr. 86.

The marriage in this case was voidable.

Valleau v. Valleau, 6 Paige, 207, 3 L. ed. 957; Cropsey v. McKinney, 80 Barb. 47; White v. Lowe, 1 Redf. 376.

It is impossible that a contract attempted by persons who were incapable of contracting, and for that reason adjudged null, can nevertheless be a valid contract.

2 Edmonds, Stat. 144, § 1.

Without qualification of any sort, the Statute expressly provides that the judgment of nullity shall be evidence of the invalidity of the marriage, and this court has several times stated that such is its effect.

Messrs. Hughes & Northrup for defendant Walter J. Price.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of court:

The primary question underlying this case is whether when a wife absents herself from her husband for five successive years without being known by him to be living within that time, and he contracts a second marriage, which is annulled, in an action between them, because the first wife is living, such second wife is entitled to dower in the real estate owned by him at the date of the entry of the judgment of nullification. In this State the right to dower arises out of the rules of the common law, except in so far as they have been changed by our statutes. By the common and canon law, a marriage by one having a spouse living and undivorced, though the spouse had been absent and believed to be dead, was void ab initio, and the person contracting a second marriage was guilty of a felony. 1 Scribner, Dower, p. 115, par. 5; 1 Bl. Com. 436; 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 256; 2 Kent, Com. 79; 1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 299.

An examination of the legislation on the subject of marriages between persons, one of whom has a spouse living, becomes necessary to enable us to determine whether the rule of the common law has been changed. By chapter 2 of the first year of James II., it was enacted that a person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife had been continually absent for seven years immediately preceding the second marriage, and not known by such person to be living within that time, should not be guilty of bigamy. The rule prescribed by this statute has remained the law of England to this day. 4 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 90.

A statute containing the same provisions, though reducing the period of absence to five years, was enacted in this State, February 7, 1788 (2 J. & V. 214), which, with slight modifications, has been continued in force to the present time. 1 Rev. Acts 1801, 122; 1 Rev. Laws 1818; 2 Rev. Stat. 687; Penal Code, §§ 298, 299.

It was held in this State that the Statute concerning bigamy did not render such a second marriage valid. Fenton v. Reed, 4 Johns. 52; Williamson v. Parisien, 1 Johns. Ch. 889, 1 L. ed. 182. And such is the rule in England. Shelf. Mar. and Div. 89, 223, 230, 479. Such was the condition of the law when the Revised Statutes of this State were enacted, and, experience having proved that the Statute in respect to bigamy had induced the contraction of second marriages by persons having spouses who had been absent for five years, and believed to be dead, which after the return of the absent husband or wife were found to be void and the issue illegitimate, it was, for the purpose of alleviating some of these consequences, enacted (2 Rev. Stat. 189): "Sec. 5. No second or other subsequent marriage shall be contracted by any person, during the lifetime of any former husband or wife of such person, unless . . . and every marriage contract in violation of the provisions of this section shall, except in the case provided for in the next section, be absolutely void. Sec. 6. If any person whose husband or wife shall have absented himself or herself, for a space of five successive years, without being known to such person to be living during that time, shall marry during the lifetime of such absent husband or wife, the marriage shall be void only from the time that its nullity shall be pronounced by a court of competent authority." It was also provided (2 Rev. Stat. 143): "Sec. 20. The chancellor (supreme court) may, by a sentence of nullity, declare void the marriage contract for either of the following causes, existing at the time of the marriage: . . . (2) That the former husband or wife of one of the parties was living, and that the marriage with such former husband and wife was then in force." "Sec. 23. When it shall appear and be so decreed that such second marriage was contracted in good faith, and with the full belief of the parties that the former husband or wife was dead, the issue of such marriage, born or begotten before its nullity be declared, shall be entitled to succeed, in the same manner as legitimate children, to the real and personal estate of the parent who at the time of the marriage was competent to contract, and the issue so entitled shall be specified in the sentence of nullity."

By these provisions such marriages ceased to be void, and became voidable and subject to be annulled, with the consequences incident to the annulment of marriages by the rules of the common law, except in so far as they were changed by the above sections and the two hereinafter quoted. By the common law, neither dower nor curtesy arises from a voidable marriage, if it be annulled during the lifetime of the parties, and, when annulled by the judgment of a competent court, they are in the same situation in respect to each other, and to rights in the property of each other, as though a marriage had never been entered into, and the children born of it are illegitimate unless legitimated by statute. Aughtie v. Aughtie, 1 Phillim. Eccl. 201; Osgo v. Acton, 1 Ld. Raym. 531; 1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. §§ 116-118; 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. §§ 690, 712; 1 Bishop, Mar. Women, §§ 247, 479, 483; 1 Brightly, Husb. and W. 7, 322; 2 Brightly, Husb. and W. 366; 1 Roper, Husb. and W. 332; Stewart, Mar. and Div. §§ 147, 429, 437.

And, in the absence of a statute saving the right to dower, the dissolution a vinculo of a valid marriage, for the fault of either party, bars it. Barrett v. Failing, 111 U. S. 528, 23 L. ed. 505; Frampton v. Stephens, 21 Ch. Div. 164; 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 537; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 921.

It is contended by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the rule of the common law was altered by the sections of the Revised Statutes hereinbefore set forth, and by the two next quoted, which are the only ones relied on as effecting a change: "Sec. 8. In case of divorce dissolving the marriage contract for the misconduct of the wife she shall not be endowed." 1 Rev. Stat. p. 741, § 8. "Sec. 48. A wife being a defendant in a suit for a divorce brought by her husband, and convicted of adultery, shall not be entitled to dower in her husband's real estate, or any part thereof, nor to any distributive share in his personal estate." 2 Rev. Stat. 146, § 48. The last section was repealed by chapter 245, Laws 1880, after it had been made a part of section 1760 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Wait v. Wait, 4 N. Y. 95, it was held that a judgment dissolving a valid marriage for the adultery of the husband did not cut off the wife's inchoate right to dower in lands of which he was at the date of the judgment or theretofore had been seised, and, she having survived, dower was assigned. The court rested its decision on the ground that the sections denying a wife's right to dower, when divorced for her adultery, by fair implication saved it when a divorce was granted for the adultery of the husband. The learned judge who wrote an opinion in the case last cited seems to have overlooked Charruau v. Charruau, 1 N. Y. Legal Obs. 184; Day v. West, 2 Edw. Ch. 592, 6 L. ed. 515, and Reynolds v. Reynolds, 24 Wend. 198, and the judgment has not escaped criticism (Moore v. Hegeman, 27 Hun, 68, affirmed, 92 N. Y. 521; 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 706), but the result reached by it has been lately confirmed by statute. Code Civil Proc. § 1754.

The changes effected by the Revised Statutes in the rights of parties entering in good faith into a marriage, while one has a living and undivorced spouse who has been absent for five years, and not known to be living, are: (1) the marriage is not void from the beginning, but voidable; (2) when judicially annulled, it is only void from the date of the judgment; (3) when so annulled, the issue may be adjudged entitled to succeed to the estate of the parent who was competent to marry, in the same manner as legitimate children; (4) it has been held that, while such a marriage remains unannulled, the cohabitation of the parties is not adulterous (Valleau v. Valleau, 6 Paige, 307, 8 L. ed. 957); also that the survivor is entitled to administration (White v. Lowe, 1 Redf. 376), and, before the passage of the Acts for the protection of married women, that the husband could hold and transfer the personal property of the wife. Cropesey v. McKinney, 80 Barb. 47.

We do not express the opinion that other changes than those mentioned have not been wrought, for we are only concerned with the claim that it has changed the common law in respect to the right of a wife to dower under such a marriage after it has been judicially annulled. The absence of a husband or wife for five years, unheard of during that time, and who is believed to be dead, is not in this State a cause for an absolute divorce. The effect of a judgment annulling a marriage upon the right of a wife to dower has never been determined in this State in any reported case except in the one at bar.

In Spicer v. Spicer, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 112, the second marriage, through which the wife claimed dower, was never dissolved, and she survived her husband; nevertheless dower was denied her. In Jones v. Zoller, 29 Hun, 551, 32 Hun, 280 (S. C. sub nom. Jones v. Fleming 87 Hun, 228), reversed, 104 N. Y. 418, 6 Cent. Rep. 518, the second marriage had not been dissolved, and the wife survived her husband.

In Brouer v. Bowers, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 214, and Griffin v. Banks, 24 How. Pr. 218, reversed, 87 N. Y. 621, the voidable marriages considered remained in force until the death of one of the spouses, and were never judicially annulled.

In the case at bar the learned general term rested its judgment on the authority of Wait v. Wait, supra, which was decided upon the ground that the sections above quoted preserved the wife's inchoate right of dower in case she was innocent and he guilty; but in the case at bar it was found and adjudged, in the action wherein the marriage was annulled, that both parties contracted their marriage in good faith, believing that the husband's former wife was dead, which judgment is declared by the statute to be conclusive between them. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 144, § 87.

The referee, upon the trial of the issue in this action, found, and the general term affirmed the finding, that both parties contracted their marriage in good faith. But we do not think those sections (8 and 48) relate to the rights of persons whose marriages are annulled, but only to those of persons divorced for adultery. There now is, and always has been, a broad distinction made by the common law, and in the statutes of this State, between actions brought to annul marriages by reason of the incapacity of the parties to legally contract them, and actions brought for their dissolution by reason of acts committed after their due and legal solemnization. The former class was provided for by article 2, chap. 8, pt. 2, Rev. Stat., and the latter by the third and fourth articles of the same chapter. The same distinction is still preserved by the Code of Civil Procedure. Title 1, chap. 15, Code Civil Proc. Section 48, above quoted, is contained in the third article, which relates to divorce a vinculo on the ground of adultery, and has no application to actions or judgments annulling marriages for causes existing prior to their solemnization. The word "misconduct," in the eighth section (1 Rev. Stat. 741), has been held by this court to mean "adultery" (Van Cleef v. Burns, 118 N. Y. 549); and the section is not applicable to this class of actions. The plaintiff is not entitled at common law, nor under the statutes of this State, to dower in any of the lands described in her complaint. The conclusion reached renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions raised by the defendants' appeals, or those presented by the appeal taken by the plaintiff.

The judgments and orders reviewed, subsequent to the judgment entered on the report of H. H. Anderson, referee, reversed, and the judgment entered on the report of H. H. Anderson, referee, on the 8th day of August, 1883, dismissing the complaint with costs, is affirmed, with costs to each of the defendants appearing by separate attorneys.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

A contested election for county seat is a contest of all the voters favoring one location against all those favoring the other. The parties being too numerous to be all brought into court, some of them are permitted to prosecute and defend for the whole, but any citizen of the county can be allowed to participate in the litigation.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cleveland County that at an election held on the 17th day of August, 1889, to determine whether the county seat of that county should be located at the Town of Rison or the Town of Kingsland in said county, Rison had received a majority of the legal votes cast at said election, and that the county seat be removed to said Town of Rison from the former county-seat location at Toledo, and that Rison should thereafter be the county seat of said county. The case was brought to the circuit court on appeal from the judgment of the county court, in which, upon the canvass of votes cast at the election by the clerk of county court, and the filing of his certificate in said court showing that Rison had received 1,009 votes and Kingsland 1,002 votes, the appellants and others gave notice that they would contest the election, and afterwards filed a written notice of contest setting out the ground upon which they relied, upon which the county court made orders for the taking of depositions, and set the cause for hearing. This was before the court had proceeded to judgment, and thus appellants became parties to the record, and made the appellees parties, the former representing Kingsland, and the latter Rison. The judgment of the county court was for Kingsland, from which appellees appealed to the circuit court, where a trial de novo was had, resulting in a judgment for Rison, from which this appeal was taken. It will be observed that there was no independent suit to contest the election after the judgment of the county court was rendered, but that appellants made themselves parties in the interest of Kingsland, and made the appellees parties in the interest of Rison, pending the determination of the election by the county court, and before any judgment had been rendered. They had a right to become parties, and appeal from the judgment of the county court, though no provision has been made by statute for an appeal in such a case. McOullough v. Blackwell, 51 Ark. 159, and authorities cited. It is contended and shown by evidence that many illegal votes were cast at the election, some by minors, some by persons convicted of infamous crimes, some by nonresidents of the county and some by persons who had not resided long enough in the county and townships in which they voted to become legal voters.

The circuit court refused the following declaration of law, asked for by appellants, and gave the converse, asked for by the appellees: "The declarations of voters, made after or before the election, showing their want of qualifications to vote, so far as age and residence are concerned, are competent and legal testimony to show that such voters did not possess such qualifications." Exceptions were saved, and it is insisted here that this is the law. The adjudicated cases on this question are not numerous, and are divided. The principal cases that hold such declarations admissible are People v. Pease, 27 N. Y. 59; State v. Olin, 23 Wis. 819; People v. Cicott, 16 Mich. 288. Among those which hold such evidence inadmissible are Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 582, by Judge Brewer; Davis v. State, 75 Tex. 420; Beardstown v. Virginia, 81 Ill. 542,—where it is held that "the declarations of a person made some time after having voted at an election, admitting or stating facts showing that he was not a legal voter, are inadmissible to show his disqualification to vote." The declarations of a voter as to his qualifications may be so contemporaneous with his voting as to be part of the res gesta, and as such competent evidence. Ibid.; Patton v. Coates, 41 Ark. 117.

Judge McCrary, in his work on Elections, § 448, says: "The English authorities, though not entirely uniform, are generally in favor of admitting such declarations, and, perhaps, the weight of authority in this country is the same way, though it cannot be denied that the tendency in the more recent, and we think also the better considered, cases is to exclude the evidence as hearsay."

The case of People v. Pease, supra, was decided by five judges against three dissenting. The case of People v. Cicott, supra, was decided by an equal division of the judges. Judge Cooley says: "If votes were taken cave voce, so that it could always be determined with absolute certainty how every person had voted, the objection to this species of scrutiny after an election had been held would not be very formidable. But when secret balloting is the policy of the law, and none is at liberty to inquire how any elector has voted, except as he may voluntarily have waived his privilege, and where consequently the avenues to correct information concerning the votes cast are carefully guarded against judicial explanation, it seems exceedingly dangerous to permit any question to be raised upon this subject." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 789. Such declarations of a voter are not admissible, on the ground that they are in derogation of an existing right of the voter, and against his interest. They are hearsay, and their admission would violate a sound rule of law, and also a sound public policy. There was no error in the circuit court's declaration of the law in this behalf.

We have reached a conclusion in the case which makes it unnecessary to discuss or determine the other questions of law raised upon the trial, and presented here by the bill of exceptions. Of the persons under age who are said to have voted for Rison we find that there are nine as to whom the evidence does not show for what place they voted. It is charged that five convicts, whose names are given, voted for Rison, and that six persons, whose names are given, voted for Rison out of their township. Again, it is contended that two persons who had not been in the State, and ten who had not been in the township in which they voted, long enough to become qualified electors voted for Rison, but the evidence fails to show how any of these persons voted. It is insisted that a number of persons who had not been residents of the county long enough to become qualified voters voted for Rison, and yet no evidence appears showing for what place nine of these voted. The disqualification as voters of nine of the minors included in the above was shown only by their admissions made after the election. Unqualified persons, voting at the election, could not change the result, unless it were shown for what place they voted. People v. Cicott, supra. Of the minors who are said to have voted for Kingsland we find no evidence showing for what place four of them voted. Of those who are said to have voted in the wrong township for Kingsland, there is one as to whom there is no evidence how he voted. All of the above have been excluded in the estimate we make of the vote, under the rule laid down above. We have estimated that the following illegal votes were cast for Rison at the election: two by persons under twenty-one years of age; nine by persons voting in the wrong townships; three by persons not long enough in the State; three by persons who were nonresidents of the county,—in all, seventeen. And that the following illegal votes were cast at the election for Kingsland: four by persons under age; ten by persons voting in the wrong townships; three by persons convicted of infamous crimes; four by persons who did not reside in the county; eight by persons who had not resided in the county long enough to become qualified voters,—total, twenty-nine.

Deducting from the 1,009 votes returned for Rison, 17 illegal votes cast for Rison, we have 992 legal votes for Rison. Deducting from the 1,002 votes returned for Kingsland the 29 illegal votes cast for Kingsland, we have 973 legal votes for Kingsland. It thus appears that there was a majority of 19 legal votes for Rison. In this estimate two votes are counted about whose identity there might have been some contest, but the exclusion of these could not change the result. In the view we have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the exclusion of certain depositions offered at the trial in behalf of Rison, or to consider the offer by citizens of Kingsland, made before the election, to pay $675 for the purpose of building a high school for colored people at Kingsland, if the county seat should be located at Kingsland.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

STATE of Texas, ex rel. Gustavus LACOUR.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

McCrary, Elections, 2d ed. § 252, p. 226.
Messrs. Hume & Kleberg for appellee.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto, brought in the name of the State of Texas upon the relation of Gustavus Lacour, for the purpose of removing appellant from the office of tax assessor of Liberty County. The appellant was chosen to that office at the general election held in November, 1890, and thereupon qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the place. The relator was the appellant's predecessor in the office. The ground upon which the reversal was sought was that the respondent was not a legal voter in the county at the time either of his election or of qualification, and that, therefore, he was not eligible to the office. The facts were that the appellant had been a resident and voter in Liberty County for many years; but in March, 1889, he removed with his family to the City of Houston, where he engaged in a mercantile business. In June, 1890, he moved back to Liberty County, and resumed his residence. There was testimony tending to show that he took up his residence in Houston for a temporary purpose, and that it was never his intention to abandon permanently his home in Liberty County, but there was also evidence tending to establish the contrary conclusion. However, the jury found that he "had not lived in the county six months prior to the election," etc.; and this may, for the purposes of this opinion, be assumed to be a finding of the issue against the appellant, and the establishment of the fact that he was not a qualified voter in the county at the time he received a majority of the votes. We then have the question, Did the fact that he was not a legal voter in the county render him ineligible to the office of tax assessor? There is no express provision to the effect that the tax assessor of a county must be a voter therein either in our Constitution or laws, and, if we decide such to be the law, we must hold that the rule results from the fundamental principles of our form of government. It is said by a recent text-writer: "Where no limitations are prescribed, the right to hold office under our political system is an implied attribute of citizenship, and is presumed to be co-extensive with that of voting at an election held for the purpose of choosing an incumbent for the office, those, and those only, who are competent to select the officer being deemed competent also to hold the office." Mechem, Pub. Off. § 67. The cases cited in support of this doctrine are State v. Smith, 14 Wis. 565, and State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 96. These cases involved the question of the eligibility of an alien to hold office under the Constitution and laws of Wisconsin, and the decisions were that citizens of the State only could hold office under the State. They are not authority, in any sense, for the proposition that a citizen of the State would be ineligible to office because for the time being he might be disqualified by reason of a change of residence from voting in a particular county. A similar question arose in State v. McMillen, 12 L. R. A.

23 Neb. 385, and there the court held that the claimant to an office was not eligible because at the time of the election he had not become a citizen of the State. In the opinion in that case it was said that, in the absence of any constitutional or statutory law upon the subject, none but voters are qualified to hold office. The case, however, did not call for so broad an announcement. In Atchison v. Lucas, 83 Ky. 451, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky decided that a woman could not hold the office of jailer, but placed their decision upon a general construction of the Constitution of the State, and not upon the fact that none but male persons were given the right to vote.

But even if the rule announced in the Nebraska case cited above be sound law, we do not think it could be properly applied to the case before us. If it be invoked to sustain a decision that none but the citizens of a State can hold offices under the state government, there is much to be said in its support. But in this State, when a candidate at an election has received a plurality of the votes, and at the same time been debarred of the right to vote upon the sole ground that he has not resided in the county for the period of six months before the election, we think the reason for the rule altogether ceases. It follows, we think, that, even upon the principles laid down in the cases first cited, the appellant should be held eligible to the office to which he was chosen. But there is a broader view of this question.

In Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 708, the chancellor who declared the opinion of the court said: "Eligibility to office is not declared as a right or principle by any express terms of the Constitution, but it results as a just deduction from the express powers and provisions of the system. The basis of the principle is the absolute liberty of the electors and the appointing authorities to choose and appoint any person who is not made ineligible by the Constitution. Eligibility to office, therefore, belongs, not exclusively or specially to electors enjoying the right of suffrage. It belongs equally to all persons whomsoever not excluded by the Constitution." When a Constitution has been framed which contains no provision defining in terms who shall be eligible to office, there is strength in the argument that the intention was to confide the selection to the untrammelled will of the electors. Experience teaches us that, in popular elections, those only are chosen who are in sympathy with the people both in thought and aspiration; and that no law is needed to secure the selection of those only who reside in the county or district in which these functions are to be performed. The Constitution of 1869 contained the provision that "no person shall be eligible to any office, state, county or municipal, who is not a registered voter in the State." Art. 3, § 14. The omission of a similar article in our present Constitution is not without significance. But in this case we are not called upon to decide whether or not the appellant would have been eligible to the office of tax assessor if he had not been a citizen of the State. He was a citizen of the State. Did the fact that he had changed his residence so short a time before the election as to deprive him of his vote at that election render him ineligible to the office of governor or to any other state or district office? We think not, and, if not, we see no good reason why he should be held ineligible to a county office. The demurrer to the information should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed, and here rendered for the appellant.

EMPIRE MILLS, Appt.,
v.
ALSTON GROCERY CO. et al.
(.....Tex. App.....)

1. The law of comity does not require that a mercantile corporation organized under the laws of another State shall be allowed to do business in Texas, as the repeal, in 1885, of a statute granting the privilege of organizing mercantile corporations is a direct prohibition against the operation of such corporations in the State.
2. A person is not estopped from denying that a so-called corporation, with which he has made a contract, is in fact a legal corporation, and from claiming that the stockholders are individually liable on the contract.

NOTE.—Corporations; individual liability on contracts.

Persons who enter into a contract in the name of a corporation which has no legal existence become individually liable thereunder. Glenn v. Bergmann, 2 West. Rep. 597, 20 Mo. App. 343; Johnson v. Corser, 84 Minn. 855.

To shield its members from personal liability on its contracts, the corporation must obtain its franchise in good faith; it cannot become incorporated in one State to do business in another. In such case the organization may be inquired into collaterally. Booth v. Wonderly, 36 N. J. L. 250.

Yet it has been held that a Connecticut corporation which did all its business and performed all its corporate acts in New York, except holding its elections, did not thereby lose its corporate character, nor render its members liable as co-partners. Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 84 N. Y. 208; Danforth v. Penny, 3 Met. 564; Second Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Hall, 35 Ohio St. 158. See notes to Leighton v. Campbell (R. I.) 9 L. R. A. 187; Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 253; McKensey v. Edwards (Ky.) 3 L. R. A. 397.

Foreign corporation; law of comity.

By state comity the rule is established that a corporation organized under the laws of a State may transact business beyond the borders of such State. Its residence in one State creates no insuperable objection to its power of contracting in another. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 621, 10 L. ed. 275; Townsend v. Jemison, 50 U. S. 9 How. 416, 13 L. ed. 198; McDonogh v. Murdoch, 56 U. S. 15 How. 413, 14 L. ed. 752; Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 57 U. S. 16 How. 352, 14 L. ed. 999; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 594, 15 L. ed. 779; Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 456, 22 L. ed. 399; Fire Asso. of Phila. v. New York, 119 U. S. 118, 30 L. ed. 843; Mathews v. Springer, 2 Abb. U. S. 298; Day v. Newark I. R. Mfg. Co. 1 Blatchf. 693; New York Dry Dock v. Hicks, 5 McLean, 115; Farmers L. & T. Co. v. McKinney, 6 McLean, 4; Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. 1 Story, 542; Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. 15; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. § 273; Taylor, Priv. Corp. chap. 7, pt. 5; Wood's Field, Priv. Corp. § 225; Potter, Corp. § 10; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 359, 361.

But the comity of States does not extend to a 12 L. R. A.

3. Stockholders are liable as partners on contracts of a corporation which they have undertaken to form for a certain business, under the laws of another State, solely because a corporation for such business could not be legally organized in the State where it was to be carried on.

(February 25, 1891.)

MOTION by appellees for a rehearing of an appeal from a judgment of the County Court for Dallas County in their favor in an action brought to render them liable as partners for a debt which they had contracted as a corporation, the first hearing having resulted in a reversal of the judgment. Motion denied.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Dickson & Moroney for appellees, in support of the motion.

Messrs. McCormick & Spence and Walton, Hill & Walton for appellant, contra.

Davidson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant sued appellees to recover an alleged indebtedness. Appellees were sued as a co-partnership firm, composed of several par-case where the corporation was authorized to do business anywhere but in the State of its incorporation. Land Grant R. & T. Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 245; Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81. See notes to Boulware v. Davis (Ala.) 9 L. R. A. 601; Pennypacker v. Capital Ins. Co. (Iowa) 8 L. R. A. 236; First Nat. Bank of Deadwood v. Gustin-Minerva Consol. Min. Co. (Minn.) 6 L. R. A. 678.

Persons dealing with, not estopped to deny its incorporation.

The general rule, that one who contracts with a body under a designation which implies its corporate existence recognizes it as invested with the attributes of a corporation, and is estopped from afterwards questioning its corporate existence, cannot be denied. But the rule has been confined to cases where the corporation, or those claiming under the corporation, assert some rights under the contract. Glenn v. Bergmann, 2 West. Rep. 597, 20 Mo. App. 343.

Illustrations of this rule are found in the cases of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McPherson, 35 Mo. 13; Smith v. Heidecker, 39 Mo. 157; Kansas City Hotel Co. v. Harris, 51 Mo. 464; Farmers & M. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 52 Mo. 17; National Ins. Co. v. Bowman, 60 Mo. 252, and Stoutimore v. Clark, 70 Mo. 471.

The propriety of applying the rule to a case where a party makes a contract with a body believing it to be a corporation, when in fact such body is no corporation, thereby leaving him remediless to enforce his contract against anyone, has been expressly denied. Hurt v. Salisbury, 55 Mo. 310, 313; Glenn v. Bergmann, supra; Richardson v. Pitts, 71 Mo. 128; Heath v. Goslin, 80 Mo. 310.

The case must be determined by the simple proposition whether at the date of the contract defendants had power to bind anyone but themselves. If they had not, they are personally liable, on the principle which makes a pretended agent liable whose principal had no existence as a legal entity. Blakely v. Bennecke, 59 Mo. 195; Heath v. Goslin, supra.

If a party who contracts with a corporation thereby estops himself, when sued on the contract, from denying the power of the corporation to make it, the principle does not apply when a corporation seeks to enforce a contract as assignee of one of the original parties. Wilks v. Georgia Paa, R. Co. 79 Ala. 130.

ties, whose names are set out in the petition. The partnership was denied under oath by all the defendants. By first supplemental petition appellant alleged that appellees had obtained an Act of incorporation from the State of Iowa for the purpose of carrying on a general mercantile business in this State; that appellees conducted a mercantile business in Dallas, Tex., and nowhere else; that said business began in March, 1886, and continued until August 16, 1887, when the Company dissolved, and Alston continued to conduct said business until November, 1887. Appellant further alleged appellees filed their Act of incorporation in Iowa, "purposely to evade and to practice a fraud upon the laws of Texas; that the laws of Texas prohibited, and did not permit or allow, the formation of such corporations, at the time specified, for the purposes or objects intended by defendant Company, and for the business conducted by the defendant Company; that the same was contrary to the public policy, and in violation of the laws of the State of Texas; and that said Act of incorporation was a fraud upon Texas, and was procured fraudulently as to both States, Iowa and Texas." Appellees filed a general demurrer thereto, which was sustained. They also filed denials of partnership under oath. The court directed a verdict to be returned against appellant, which was done, and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant prosecuted his appeal to this court, and during this term of this court the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded; and in due time appellees filed their motion for rehearing, in which it is urged that the court erred in remanding the case, and suggested that the rehearing be granted, and the judgment be affirmed. In the opinion heretofore rendered this court held that "in so far as it [the Act of incorporation of appellee Company] was intended to operate in this State, it is absolutely void, and that in conducting said business appellees were in fact and in law co-partners, and not a corporation, and that the court erred in rendering judgment for appellees." In this motion for rehearing appellees contend that, by a rule of comity, a corporation organized in one State is permitted to transact business in other States, "unless such rule of comity is expressly repealed;" and that "this repeal will not be implied from the fact that, in the State where such corporation seeks to do business, a corporation for like purposes could not be organized;" and virtually that the power of a State to "repeal this general rule of comity does not extend to foreign corporations," etc. If appellee be correct, then the rule of comity would be superior to the statutory provisions of the State where the corporation was seeking to do business. Appellee states his proposition in advance of and beyond what we understand the law to be. "A corporation is the creature of a statute immediately creating it, or authorizing proceedings for its organization." "The powers of a corporation, under statutes, are such, and such only, as the statutes confer." Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 882; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 4, and notes; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 206, and notes, and collated authorities on pages 206-209. All the authorities on the subject agree that such is the law. Again, it may be said in this connection that "it is a fundamental principle that the laws of a State can have no binding force, proprio vigore, outside of the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the State enacting them." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1st ed. § 500; Story, Conf. L. § 7; Sedgw. Stat. and Const. L. 69. "Hence it follows that a State cannot grant to any person the right to exercise a franchise in a foreign State or country; for a franchise is the result of a law authorizing particular individuals to do acts or enjoy immunities which are not allowed to the community at large." Same authority. See also Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 585.

"A grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the incorporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise provided) from individual liability. The corporation, being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty. The recognition of its existence even by other States, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those States." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1st ed. § 500; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 588, 10 L. ed. 807; Runyan v. Coster, 89 U. S. 14 Pet. 129, 180, 10 L. ed. 886; Land Grant R. & T. Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 252; Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 281; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 287; Francisco Texan Land Co. v. Laigle, 59 Tex. 389; Wright v. Bundy, 11 Ind. 398; Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509; Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 84 N. Y. 208, 220; McCall v. Byram Mfg. Co. 6 Conn. 428, 435, note a; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 181, 19 L. ed. 860; Smith v. Alford, 68 Barb. 428.

The rule of comity is entirely in subjection to the sovereign will of the State, and can only exist by permission of the State in which it is sought to employ it. A corporation has no implied authority to do any act in a foreign State which is not permitted by the laws of the latter to individuals generally. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1st ed. § 505, and note 1. Speaking of the limit of the rule of comity, the same author says: "By the common law, the right of acting in a corporate capacity is not accorded freely and without conditions to everyone, but must be derived from an Act of the Legislature. It is evident that there are reasons of public policy underlying this restriction, and it cannot be assumed that its effect may be nullified by the comity extended towards foreign States. To obtain a charter for the purpose of evading the laws of a foreign State, under cover of the rule of comity, would be a fraud upon the State granting the charter; and to attempt to act under such charter in the foreign State would be a fraud upon the latter." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1st ed. § 508. Comity was never accorded for the purpose of giving any State an unlimited power to dispose of the franchise of acting in a corporate capacity in other States, or to "spawn corporations" for that purpose. Land Grant R. & T. Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 254. No rule of comity will allow one State to charter corporations to operate in another State, unless there is willingness on the part of the foreign State that it should be so. To hold otherwise would be to say that the right of one State, aided by comity, is superior to the sovereign will of the other. This involves the surrender of sovereignty to a rule of comity, and to a matter of international etiquette, which no independent nationality should for a moment think of doing. It is not necessary that a State should by express enactment exclude foreign corporations in order to indicate that they shall not be allowed to act within its jurisdiction; the will of the State may be implied from its general policy and legislation. "Whenever a State sufficiently indicates that contracts which derive their validity from its comity are repugnant to its policy, or are considered as injurious to its interests, the presumption in favor of its adoption can no longer be made." Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 592, 10 L. ed. 309; Myers v. Manhattan Bank, 20 Ohio, 301, 302; Starkweather v. American Bible Soc. 73 Ill. 50; United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 78 Ill. 144; American & F. O. U. v. Yount, 101 U. S. 356, 25 L. ed. 890. In this last-cited case Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking of the rule of comity, said: "In harmony with the general law of comity obtaining among the States composing the Union, the presumption should be indulged that a corporation of one State, not forbidden by the law of its being, may exercise, within any other State, the general powers conferred by its own charter, unless it is prohibited from so doing, either in the direct enactments of the latter State, or by its public policy, to be deduced from the general course of legislation, or from the settled adjudications of its highest court." Page 356 of said case. See Taylor, Priv. Corp. Having Capital Stock, § 384. (In accordance with these principles, see authorities collated in note to above-cited section. They are too numerous to cite here.) Therefore an Act of incorporation, procured for the purpose from one State to evade the laws of another State, and to carry on its business in the latter State, would constitute it a fraud upon the State granting the corporate powers, as well as upon the State in which it is sought to organize and operate the corporation. It is equally well settled that the corporation cannot exercise its corporate powers in the foreign State when it is prohibited from doing so by direct enactment of the Legislature of that State; it is also as well settled that the Act of incorporation cannot be put into operation there if the will of the State can be implied from its general policy and legislation, nor can it exercise its powers therein if the settled adjudications of the higher court of the State are adverse thereto.

Applying these rules to the action of the court sustaining the general demurrer, we are of opinion that said ruling was erroneous. The first supplemental petition presented issues and facts which clearly avoided appellees' denial of partnership. The Act of incorporation, if in accord with the laws of Iowa, but procured for the purpose of evading the laws and public policy of Texas, or the general policy of her legislation, or the adjudications of her courts of last resort, would be void and of no effect; and because the appellees may have carried on business in Dallas, Tex., holding themselves out as a corporate body, that fact would not constitute a corporation. By an examination of the laws and the Constitution of Texas, we are led to the conclusion that appellees, even had they organized under the Laws of Iowa, could not have carried on a corporate business in this State, as general merchants, by virtue of such Act of incorporation. The Constitution provides that "no private corporation shall be created except by general laws." Const. 1876, art. 12, § 1. By an Act of the Legislature provision was made for the creation and operation of such companies. Rev. Stat. 1879, art. 566, subd. 27. This subdivision of said article was repealed by an Act of the Legislature in 1885 (Acts 1885, p. 59). Said article 566 was amended again in 1887, but subdivision 27 was not re-enacted. This repeal of said subdivision 27 was an emphatic denial to all parties of the right to organize mercantile corporations in this State, and directly prohibitory of such corporations operating in Texas. The Statute granted the privilege, and then revoked it. This superseded the rule of comity, and prohibited the foreign corporations. Not only so, but the Legislature, during the same Session of 1887, enacted another law, requiring foreign corporations, under heavy penalties, to obtain permits to do business in this State. Acts 1887, p. 116. This was prohibitory legislation of a decidedly marked and stringent character. So far as this is concerned, it is immaterial that said Act may have been held unconstitutional, for it very clearly expresses the legislative policy as to foreign corporations. It did not change or alter the policy already in vogue, but only the more strongly emphasized it as to these corporations. It would hardly be contended that, in repealing subdivision 27 of article 566 of the Revised Statutes, the Legislature intended to exclude and debar the citizens of Texas from this field of corporation business, and leave it open to corporations from foreign States and nations under the rule of comity. Legislatures are not presumed to do unwise or foolish things, they are not presumed to legislate against the interests, rights and privileges of the citizens of their own States, nor are they presumed to intend to legislate adversely to the citizens of their own country and in favor of foreign corporations. Under the first supplemental petition of appellant, it became a question whether the appellee's Act of incorporation in Iowa was sought as an evasion of, and a fraud upon, the laws of Texas, or the public policy of her general legislation, and it became a question, and an issue therein, to be determined on the trial, whether the Act of incorporation was a fraud upon either or both of said States. These matters, as well as other things, were pleaded in said petition. The petition was not subject to the general demurrer interposed, when viewed from this standpoint.

In the motion for rehearing it is contended that appellant dealt with the appellees as a corporation, and that it is thereby estopped from denying the corporate capacity of appellees. This is a question of fact to be determined on the trial. Appellant contends that appellees were partners. He alleges that the "Act of incorporation" of appellees constituted, in law and in fact, no corporation. These are questions of law and fact. If appellees had organized a valid corporation, and were authorized to do business as such corporation in this State, and appellant so dealt with them, he might be estopped from denying their corporate capacity. But if appellees were not a valid corporation, and had no authority and were not permitted to do business as such corporation, then he would not necessarily be estopped from denying their corporate powers and existence. That appellees called themselves a corporation does not constitute them a corporate body. Obligors are bound, not by the style which they give to themselves, but by the consequences which they incur by reason of their acts. It matters not what they call themselves. Chaffe v. Ludeling, 27 La. Ann. 607; National Bank of Watertown v. Landon, 45 N. Y. 410, 414; Ridenour v. Mayo, 40 Ohio St. 9. "A corporate creditor, seeking to enforce the payment of his debt, may, however, ignore the existence of the corporation, and may proceed against the supposed stockholders as partners, by proving the prescribed method of becoming incorporated was not complied with by the company in question." Cook, Stock and Stockholders, 1st ed. § 283; Bigelow v. Gregory, 73 Ill. 197; Abbott v. Omaha Smelt. & Ref. Co. 4 Neb. 416; Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81; Garnett v. Richardson, 35 Ark. 144; Coleman v. Coleman, 78 Ind. 844; Kaiser v. Lawrence Sav. Bank, 56 Iowa, 104; Martin v. Fewell, 79 Mo. 401, 410.

The creditor "is not estopped from so doing, since he is not repudiating a contract, but is enforcing it. The fact that he contracted with them under a corporate name is immaterial, since, at common law, parties may carry on business under any name they choose." Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 283. The defense relied on was based on the idea and assertion that the appellees constituted a corporation, and were not partners. This is one of the principal grounds urged for the rehearing. Appellees testified that they were incorporated, and so held themselves out to the world. It is true it was testified that they told parties that they were incorporated. But that did not make it so. The law requires some things of parties who may have the legal right to incorporate, and these requisites must be complied with before the corporation can be organized legally. Unless it be so organized, and in strict accord with the law authorizing its creation or formation, it cannot exercise the function of a corporation. Franco-Texas Land Co. v. Laigle, 59 Tex. 389; Bigelow v. Gregory, Abbott v. Omaha Smelt. & Ref. Co., Garnett v. Richardson, Coleman v. Coleman, Kaiser v. Lawrence Sav. Bank, Martin v. Fewell and Ridenour v. Mayo, supra.

"The question as to the existence of a partnership is a mixed question of law and fact; and the testimony of a witness in respect to it amounts, frequently, to nothing more than the expression of an opinion." Ridenour v. Mayo, 40 Ohio St. 13. So it may be of a corporation, even where the corporation is authorized by the law of the land, and the corporation has made an attempt to comply with and incorporate under the statute, but has failed in the attempt. But it is admitted and testified by appellees that the laws of Texas prohibited their pretended Act of incorporation, and that, so far as Texas was concerned, they could not secure a charter, and were not permitted to incorporate here. They not only failed to show themselves a corporation, but utterly excluded that idea, and conclusively proved that they could not be a corporation under the laws of Texas, because prohibited therefrom by the laws of said State. Where a company relies on its corporate capacity, the fact that it is a corporation must be made to appear, and the burden is upon the company to do so. Authorities above cited. Corporations as such can only possess such powers as are conferred on them by the Statute creating them or authorizing their creation. This is universally so. If it fails to incorporate under such law, then it is invalid, because there is nothing from which it can spring, nor on which it can base its life and existence. Without the law of its creation, it is not a creature. It is artificial, and can have no existence, and no authority, except as conferred by the law of its creation. Abrogate the law, and the corporate body cannot organize. But it does not follow that, because of a failure to comply with the law, its contracts are void. It is still a company of individuals making contracts and dealing in the affairs of the world. These contracts are not necessarily void. The company or members thereof might sue and be sued as co-partners on such contracts. This would not lead to the repudiation of their contracts, but to the enforcement thereof. There is a very marked distinction to be noticed as to the relations such a company would occupy towards the State as to its corporate capacity, and its attitude towards individuals with reference to contracts entered into with such individuals, and financial transactions carried on between them. This is distinctly recognized in this State. Texas Land & Mortg. Co. v. Worsham, 76 Tex. 556. Our supreme court says in that case: "We do not think that a failure of the corporation to procure a permit, even if such failure had the effect of preventing it from further prosecuting its business in this State, should have the further effect of closing the courts of the State to it so as to preclude it from asserting rights and recovering property already acquired." Authorities heretofore cited show this distinction is recognized everywhere where equity prevails. Because the Act of incorporation is void, it does not follow that contracts made with the Company are void, or non-enforceable in the courts. "The mere assumption of corporate powers, without any attempt at incorporation, cannot, of course, protect the members from liability." Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 284; Pettis v. Atkins, 60 Ill. 454; Fuller v. Rowe, 57 N. Y. 23. They would be partners. Fuller v. Rowe, supra.

By the rule of comity, a corporation organized under the laws of a State may transact business beyond the borders of that State. By this rule it will be observed that the corporation is required to organize, and that organization must take place under the laws of the State where said organization is authorized, and not elsewhere. An attempt to organize the corporation is not sufficient, and does not meet the requirement and demand of the law, nor does it comply with the rule of comity. A failure to so organize falls short of the requirements of the law, as well as of the rule of comity. The corporation must organize, else it is not a corporation. The rule of comity does not supply corporate powers nor confer corporate capacity. "It merely enables a body of incorporators, chartered by one State, to act in a corporate capacity in another State, subject to all the laws and regulations of the latter." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 505; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 588, 589, 10 L. ed. 807, 808; Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 28 Ill. 579; Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1; Hill v. Beach 13 N. J. Eq. 81; Ang. & A. Corp. 250 et seq.; Aspinwall v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 20 Ind. 492; Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 232; Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 505; Merriek v. Van Santvoord, 84 N. Y. 220; Smith v. Alford, 63 Barb. 428; Wright v. Bundy, 11 Ind. 398; McCall v. Byram Mfg. Co. 6 Conn. 428, 435, and note a.

An examination of the case before us discloses no organization by appellees as a corporation at any time or place. One of the witnesses testified that they organized their business in Dallas, Tex., but no evidence is adduced on the subject of their organization as a corporate body. The Act of incorporation required them to elect a president, vice-president, and other officers, and a board of directors, and, so far as we have been able to ascertain, this was not done. They were required to hold annual meetings, and this was not done, although it continued in business for a year and a half about. At the end of this time Mr. Alston says he bought up the stock, and continued business a few months longer. They did no act in Iowa save to file their Act of incorporation. It was never contemplated that they should or would do anything more than that in that State. It was testified also that the reason, and the only reason, said Act of incorporation was resorted to and procured in that State, was because such a business as they contemplated could not be incorporated in Texas. Appellees did not act in good faith in procuring their Act of incorporation, as is disclosed by their own evidence. In order that such corporate character be sustained, even if the parties had fully incorporated and organized as a corporate body, it is necessary that both the State creating the corporation and the corporation created shall have acted in good faith in conferring and taking the corporate privileges. These things, being matters of proof, must be shown by evidence, and it devolved upon appellees to show this. "A corporation must have obtained its franchise in good faith, in order to preserve its corporate character in its contracts, and shield its members from personal liability on such contracts." A corporation cannot incorporate in one State for the purpose of carrying on all of its corporate business in another. The stockholders would be held to be partners. Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 288. See also Land Grant R. & T. Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 245; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 1st ed. § 513; Erie R. Co. v. State, 81 N. J. L. 543, 544. That the Alston Grocery Company could, as a corporation, maintain suits, or could even have so done as such corporation, in this State, while in business, would hardly be affirmed by any lawyer; but that it could have, as a firm of individuals or partners, maintained or defended such suits, could not be successfully denied. The authorities already cited amply and fully sustain these positions. We are of the opinion that appellees were partners, and that appellant's suit was properly brought.

The record shows that the Alston Grocery Company was not a corporation, and this is conclusively proven by themselves by their testimony. We are further of the opinion that the motion for a rehearing manifests no reason why we should recede from the opinion heretofore rendered herein, and said motion is therefore overruled.

NOTE.—Indorsement and transfer of commercial paper without recourse.

An indorser is one who writes his name upon a negotiable instrument prior to transferring it by delivery. Anderson, Dict. 589.

An indorsement without recourse, made to evade liability for the solvency of prior parties, does not make the transfer less complete. Welch v. Lindo, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 159, 3 L. ed. 801; Waite v. Foster, 33 Me. 424; Fitchburg Bank v. Greenwood, 2 Allen, 484; Hayne v. Ditto, 27 La. Ann. 622; Story, Prom. Notes, § 146; 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 720.

which is accepted in full satisfaction, and a transfer of the note to the indorser by an indorsement without recourse, give him an immediate right of action against the maker, either on the note as equitable assignee, or for money paid to the maker's use. Stanley v. McElrath, 10 L. R. A. 545, 549, 32 Cal. 449.

To complete a contract of indorsement, in addition to writing the name on the back, the further act of delivering the instrument to the person to whom title is to be transferred is necessary, as indorsement imports delivery. Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 519.

APPEAL by defendant Butler from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling his motion for new trial in an action brought to enforce his alleged liability as indorser of a promissory note in which a judgment had been entered against him in favor of plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. R. Huddleston for appellant.

Messrs. George H. Taylor and Charles J. Bartleson for respondent.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Butler, payee of the negotiable promissory note on which this action was founded, made and signed a writing on the back of it, thus: "For value received I hereby assign and transfer the within note, together with all interests in and all rights under the mortgage securing the same, to L. D. Cooke." It is contended by appellant that this was but a naked assignment of the paper, and that Butler cannot be held as an indorser of the same. We have carefully examined the authorities at our command, and have been unable to add a single one to those cited by appellant's counsel in support of his position, namely, Hailey v. Falconer, 33 Ala. 586, and Aniba v. Yeomans, 39 Mich. 171. In the Alabama case the payee of the note wrote these words upon its back: "For value received . . . I transfer unto J. P. Hailey all my right and title in the within note, to be enjoyed in the same manner as may have been by me,"—signing the name. It was held that this was a qualified indorsement, exempting the signer from liability, precisely as if nothing had appeared but his name, and the words "without recourse" above or underneath it. In its opinion the court stated the law to be that any words in an indorsement which clearly demonstrate an intention of the indorser to make it a qualified one will have that effect. The rule on this subject was correctly stated beyond a doubt, but misapplied, in our judgment. We think this apparent from the examples of qualified indorsement given by the court in support of its position. All clearly demonstrated the indorsee's intention to exempt themselves from future liability, in the plainest language. It was said, among other things, that a design to qualify the indorsement was apparent from the use of the words, "to be enjoyed in the same manner as may have been by me," the effect being to restrain the more general words found in other parts of the indorsement; that they must be given effect, and were meaningless, unless intended to exempt the indorser from liability by providing that the indorsee should not enjoy the right and title transferred to him in a "manner" different from that enjoyed by the indorser himself. The conclusion reached was largely made to depend upon the clause, "to be enjoyed in the same manner as may have been by me," and not upon the fact that the assignment was expressed, instead of being left for implication. There are no words

If the accommodation paper is a bond, which the obligee refuses to accept, it is void in the hands of a third person, for want of delivery, although he is a purchaser for value. Parker v. McDowell, 95 N. C. 219; Ray v. Banks, 6 Jones, L. 118. And see Respass v. Latham, Bush, L. 138; Dewey v. Cochran, 4 Jones, L. 184, and Southerland v. Whitaker, 5 Jones, L. 5, approved but distinguished.

Where an accommodation note was made payable to the order of the cashier of a particular bank, to be discounted at that bank, but the bank refused to discount it, and it was afterwards discounted by a third party, the note was held void, there being no proof of consideration, although the cashier indorsed it "without recourse." Parker v. McDowell, supra. Compare Southerland v. Whitaker and Dewey v. Cochran, supra.

An indorser who puts his name above that of the payee of a note disqualifies himself from recourse to his payee as liable to him in the order of time. The parties must sue or be sued on negotiable paper in the order in which they have seen fit to sign it. Sweet v. Powers, 72 Mich. 393. See Greusel v. Hubbard, 61 Mich. 25.

By the law of Kentucky and of Virginia, every reasonable effort must be made to recover of the drawer by suit, before the assignee can have recourse against the assignor or indorser. Bank of United States v. Weisiger, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 331, 7 L. ed. 441.

"Without recourse," effect of indorsement.

The expression "without recourse," does not throw suspicion on the paper (Stevenson v. O'Neal, 71 Ill. 314; Kelley v. Whitney, 45 Wis. 110; 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 723); nor will it affect its negotiability (Rice v. Stearns, 3 Mass. 226; Lomax v. Picot, 2 Rand. 200); nor will it render an indorser liable who was not so otherwise. Collier v. Mahan, 21 Ind. 110.

An indorsement on the back of a note of the words, "I sign this note to N. H. Garretson without recourse,"—although there is a plain misuse of words, passes title to the note. Brotherton v. Street, 124 Ind. 690.

An assignment of "all my right and title" indorsed on a note "to be enjoyed in the same manner as may have been by me" is equivalent to an indorsement without recourse. Hailey v. Falconer, 33 Ala. 586.

The words "without liability in case of nonacceptance or nonpayment" written after indorser's signature, are equivalent to the words without recourse. Ibid.; Story, Prom. Notes, § 133, 144.

Where an executor indorses as such to the testator's widow, under a special agreement on her part releasing the estate it is a special indorsement without incurring liability. Wade v. Wade, 36 Tex. 529.

An order indorsed payable to A "at his own risk" will not render the indorser liable as such, and the note will still remain negotiable. Rice v. Stearns, supra.

Where a stranger to the instrument indorses it "without recourse," he may still be held liable as an original promisor. Childs v. Wyman, 44 Me. 438.

The words "old firm in liquidation," added to a partnership indorsement, will not render it an indorsement without recourse. Fassin v. Hubbard, 55 N. Y. 465.

Evidence that an indorsement in blank was "without recourse" is inadmissible. Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30, 26 L. ed. 647. See article in 18 Cent. L. J. 332-334.

The Codes of some of the States provide for indorsements without recourse, and regulate the rights and liabilities of the parties in such cases. See 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, 363, enumerating the various States. See note to Adrian v. McCaskill (N. C.) 3 L. R. A. 759.

of this import in the assignment now under consideration. But if the law was correctly determined in Hailey v. Falconer, the indorsement was restrictive as well as qualified, and this was the real question at issue in Aniba v. Yeomans, supra. There the indorsement made by the payee read: "I hereby transfer my right, title and interest of the within note to S. A. Yeomans," but the controversy was not as to the liability of the indorser,—it was whether the indorsee could recover of the maker as a bona fide holder for value. It was determined that he could not; that the right and title passing under the customary indorsement in blank was much greater than the mere right, title and interest of the payee; and that no greater right, title and interest than he had could pass under such a transfer. The indorsee could look to the maker, but not beyond nor differently. He could not be permitted to fall back upon the indorser nor to collect from the maker in case the payee could not have collected. The result of this decision was to give to the indorsement a more restrictive effect than an indorsement "without recourse" would have had, for it is well settled that such an indorsement does not destroy the negotiable character of the paper upon which it has been placed. But the remark which counsel attempts to make pertinent here was clearly obiter, for the issue was, as before stated, as to the restrictive character of the indorsement, and not whether the indorser qualified a liability he would have assumed by the ordinary indorsement in blank. The indorsement of a promissory note is commonly accomplished in the manner just mentioned. When so done, two contracts are entered into,—one, that of the sale or assignment, completely executed; the other, that of a future, but conditional, liability, executory and by implication, from the sale and assignment. Both are as complete, however, as if each was expressed with great formality and precision above the signature. In the case at bar we find the executed contract carefully, but unnecessarily, detailed, and the question resolves itself into an inquiry whether by reason of this particularity, a formal expression of that which the law would import from the signature alone, the other contract, executory as to future liability upon condition,—also imported from the bare signature of the indorser,—is negatived, and has been excluded. It would seem obvious that, when writing out upon the back of the paper just what would have been inferred from his signature, the indorser has incurred no greater liability,—has done no more than he would, had he simply placed his signature there. How can it be said, then, that he has done less, in the absence of that clear declaration of his intent to exempt himself, mentioned in all of the authorities, as necessary in the case of a qualified indorsement? The reason given seems to be that because one part of this double contract of indorsement, always inferred, has been expressed, the other part, also always inferred, must, of necessity, be excluded. Whenever the view contended for by appellant has been adopted, it has been predicated upon the maxim, expressio unius, est exclusio alterius. We agree with the author of one of the leading text-books, who asserts that the less common maxim, expressio eorum qua tacite insunt nihil operatur, is the one that should obtain. Many examples could be given where the expression, in contracts, of things tacitly implied, has no effect; for illustration, a written warranty of the quality of provisions would not exclude or negative the implied warranty of title. The appellant in this case, with much care, indicated his purpose to sell and transfer the note, but he failed to limit and qualify his indorsement by words which would clearly indicate such an intent, if in fact it existed. It was incumbent upon him to do so if he intended or expected to escape the liability of the ordinary indorser. The phrase "without recourse," or its equivalent, which must be used on such occasions, is a very simple one, and in everyday use. The appellant did not insert in his contract of indorsement this phrase, or words equivalent thereto. To relieve one who puts his name on the back of a negotiable promissory note from liability as an indorser he must insert in the contract itself words clearly expressing such an intention. Although the appellant's assignment of the paper was expressed instead of implied, he did not thereby exempt himself from the liability of an indorser in blank. Sears v. Lantz, 47 Iowa, 658; Adams v. Blathon, 66 Me. 19; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 688, notes b and c; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 704; 1 Edwards, Bills and Notes, § 398. See also Dixon v. Clayville, 44 Md. 573; Kilpatrick v. Heaton, 8 Brev. 92; Shelby v. Judd, 24 Kan. 168; Dunning v. Heller, 103 Pa. 269; Richards v. Frankum, 9 Car. & P. 221.

Order affirmed.

Gillilan, Ch. J., and Dickinson, J.:

We dissent. When the payee or indorsee of a promissory note merely writes his name on the back of it, the presumption is that he does it for the purpose of a double contract,—a contract of transfer and a contract of conditional liability. In such case the law implies the two contracts, because, that being the form in which, by the law-merchant, the two contracts are entered into, it presumes the parties intended both. The implication is not made contrary to their manifest intention. All the authorities agree that by writing over the signature they may exclude any implication. The only difference in the cases is as to what will have that effect. In our opinion, when the writing expresses, no matter in what form, the purpose with which the name is indorsed, it excludes the implication of any other purpose. When the writing expresses one contract, the parties will be presumed to have expressed all they intended; the written will be presumed to be the entire contract. It shows that the parties were not content with the implication of intention which the law raises upon the bare signature on the back of the note; for why should they take pains to express in writing one of the contracts which would be implied from the bare signature, if they intended not only that contract, but the other also?

* 1. No part of the fund set apart appropriated in accordance with the rules, regulations and by-laws of either of the societies or associations enumerated in Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 368, or by any society or association similar thereto (§369), to be paid over to the family of a deceased member (unless the amount exceeds the sum of $5,000), can be seized or appropriated by legal process to satisfy a debt due from a member of the family, or from the society or organization itself.

2. The Bankers' Life Association, a corporation organized under the laws of this State for the purpose of life insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan, is an association of the same character as those mentioned in said section 368, and its funds are exempt from execution to the same extent.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County discharging the garnishee, from which plaintiff sought to collect the amount due on a judgment which he had recovered against defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick B. Lathrop, for appellant:

Defendant claimed exemption under laws which provide that funds shall under no circumstances be liable to be seized, taken or appropriated to pay any debt of a deceased member. This Statute must be construed strictly. The exemption applies only against collection of a debt of a deceased member.

Olson v. Nelson, 3 Minn. 58; Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419; Grimes v. Bryne, 2 Minn. 89; Barker v. Kelderhouse, 3 Minn. 207.

The words "shall be exempt from execution" do not establish a general exemption unmodified by the words "to pay any debt of a deceased member." For if so construed, the remainder of the section after the word "execution" is superfluous and insignificant. The Statute must be construed so that "if it can be prevented no clause, section or word shall be void, superfluous or insignificant."

McNamara v. Minnesota (1), R. Co. 12 Minn. 388; King v. Kelly, 26 Minn. 524; Rothschild v. Boelter, 18 Minn. 361.

Defendant cannot claim a liberal construction under the rule of "benevolent design." Respondent is not a benevolent society.

Insurance money is not exempt, nor can liberal rules of construction be invoked to make it so.

Respondent claims that this fund belongs to the family. If that is true, defendant is entitled to one fifth of it in her own right. The wife is a member of the family.

The share of each beneficiary vests in him separately.

Union Mut. Aid Assn. of Battle Creek v. Montgomery, 70 Mich. 587.

Defendant is sole beneficiary. This is an insurance contract governed by ordinary rules of construction. Respondent is not a benevolent association, but a mutual insurance company.

Mr. John D. O'Brien, for Alice Balfour, respondent:

The terms of the contract are to be construed with a view to effectuate the purposes for which the Association was organized, and the same liberal rule of construction which prevails in the case of wills is applicable to the disposition of funds created by mutual benefit associations.

The garnishee under its charter could not issue a certificate which would divert the fund into a channel other than that provided for by its charter.

Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 18 Bush, 489.

The deceased, by the express terms of his contract, had no power to designate his wife or anybody else except his family as beneficiary, even had he so desired.

If deceased had no authority to designate Mrs. Balfour, of course she could not have it in her power to defeat both the express terms of the contract and the design for which the association was organized by diverting the fund from its proper channel and subjecting it to the claims of her creditors.

Daniels v. Pratt, 8 New Eng. Rep. 480, 143 Mass. 231; Bacon, Benefit Societies, 312.

The fund is exempt by virtue of chap. 34, § 368, Gen. Stat. 1878, and also by virtue of § 17, chap. 184, Gen. Laws 1885.

Schilling v. Boes, 85 Ky. 357.

It is the duty of the court to construe the Statute liberally and in such a manner as to carry out the benevolent purpose sought to be provided for, and in no event, unless absolutely required by its language, to construe it so as to defeat such purpose.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff (appellant), having previously obtained a judgment against defendant, garnished the Bankers' Life Association, a corporation organized in the year 1880 in the manner prescribed and under the provisions of title 3, chap. 34, Gen. Stat. 1878, which title relates to corporations other than those for pecuniary profit. The general plan, as shown by the articles of incorporation, was to unite and associate in membership male persons possessing certain specified qualifications, for the purpose of obtaining employment while living, and at their decease for securing and rendering pecuniary assistance in a stated amount to their families, by means of assessments upon the survivors, the amount being paid over in each case,—when collected,—to the person designated to receive the same for the family by the deceased member when making application for membership or thereafter. The Association had no capital stock, its entire assets being derived from its members. When joining, each paid into its treasury a sum equal in amount to his age, styled a "guaranty deposit," and another sum equal in amount to 2 per cent of the guaranty deposit, in full for the first casual assessment against him, both of these sums being set apart as a beneficiary fund to be paid over to the families of deceased members. The applicant also paid a membership fee and his pro rata proportion of the annual expense assessment for the unexpired portion of the current fiscal year. Thereafter the member was assessed, periodically, for operating expenses, and, casually, for such sums as became necessary for the payment of death claims, the casual assessment being 2 per cent of the guaranty deposit for each death claim. The garnishee was beyond doubt an insurance society or association doing business on the co-operative or assessment plan, incorporated for the sole purpose of mutual protection, and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families of deceased members. It was therefore expressly exempted, by section 368, chap. 34, supra, from the provisions of the general Life Insurance Laws of the State; and by subsequent legislation it had been made subject to certain rules laid down for the regulation and government of all corporations, associations and societies of its character. Gen. Laws 1885, §§ 5, 6, chap. 184.

Mathew A. Balfour became a member of this Association on March 7, 1887, and died January 7, 1890, leaving as members of his family a widow, the defendant, and four minor children. In the certificate of membership—in the ordinary form—issued to him when joining, the Association agreed and covenanted, subject to certain provisos, of no consequence in these proceedings, to pay to his family, and on the receipt of the representative thereof named in his application, the sum of $2,000 within sixty days after due proof of his decease. Due proof of his death was made, but for reasons going to the merits, and not with respect to this defendant's right to act as plaintiff, and as the duly designated representative of the deceased member's family, the Association refused to pay. Legal proceedings were had for a recovery upon the certificate, the widow being plaintiff, which resulted in a verdict in her favor on June 20, 1890, for the sum of $2,085. The garnishee summons was served on the Association the following day. It would be a waste of time for us to discuss or determine in this proceeding just what right or interest this defendant has in the amount to be paid over when judgment is entered upon that verdict, whether she holds the whole in her own right or simply in trust, or whether she has an absolute title to one fifth, as a member of a family consisting of five persons. She recovered upon the certificate solely, claiming no rights except such as were found therein; and in this proceeding, at least, the terms of the certificate must govern the plaintiff.

Whatever the widow's interest in the fund, whether great or small, the amount thereof is beyond the reach of her creditors, so long as it remains unpaid. Section 369 of said chapter 34 (the same being § 2 of chap. 128, Gen. Laws 1877), reads as follows: "When any benevolent association or society similar to those enumerated in section 1 of this Act [§ 368] set apart or appropriated a beneficiary fund to be paid over to the families of deceased, or to any member of said families, any such fund, not exceeding the sum of $5,000, so provided and set apart according to the rules, regulations or by-laws of said association or society to the family of any deceased member, or to any member of said family, shall be exempt from execution, and shall under no circumstances be liable to be seized, taken or appropriated by any legal or equitable process to pay any debt of such deceased member."

The rule of construction laid down by this court (McNamara v. Minnesota Cent. R. Co. 12 Minn. 388, Gil. 269; King v. Kelly, 25 Minn. 524), that a statute must be construed so that, if it can be prevented, no clause, section or word shall be void, superfluous or without significance, is quoted by appellant's counsel, and we readily agree with him that this rule must be regarded when construing section 869. Force and effect should be given to each part, and the legislative intent discovered, if possible. This particular portion of the section has not been made quite as plain, perhaps, as it has in later legislation upon this class of associations (sec. 17, chap. 184, supra); but the difference in the language, if there be any, is scarcely perceptible. If, as claimed by appellant, these clauses in reference to an exemption of the fund (one prohibiting its seizure upon execution, the other its appropriation in payment of the debts of the deceased), relate to the same subject matter,—the indebtedness of the member, and to no other indebtedness,—the clause or provision in reference to an execution is surplusage, for the succeeding clause covers the whole ground; it absolutely and without the slightest opportunity for misapprehension forbids the application of any part of the fund in payment of the decedent's liabilities. From the language used in the Statute under consideration it is not only evident that the law-makers took special care to protect the fund created and set apart in these associations and societies from demands which might be asserted by creditors of deceased members, but that they intended to and did go further in the matter of protection and exemption. Having in mind the worthy and benevolent design made so prominent in organizations of this character, realizing that the fund accumulated by assessment upon the living was for the relief and assistance of the families of deceased members, not for the benefit of creditors, and appreciating, undoubtedly, the unwisdom of prohibiting the use of the money in payment of debts contracted by members, and, at the same time, allowing it to be seized by the creditor of a beneficiary in payment of his debt, or otherwise allowing it to be diverted from coming into the hands of those for whom it was designed and created, the legislators expressly enacted that it should be exempt from execution, in addition to providing that no part should go to the creditors of the member. The object which seems to have been kept in view and to have been accomplished by the use of words which prevent the interposition of legal process whereby the money may be turned aside from a benevolent channel and placed in the hands of a creditor of a member, or of one of his family,—a beneficiary,—or even of a creditor of the Association, was the relief and assistance, when most needed, of those for whom the fund was designed and created, the complete immunity of the fund itself from the process of the courts. Obviously the amount due upon the decease of a member has been placed beyond seizure for the debt of a member, or a beneficiary, or of the Association itself. Language, found in an Act creating a similar association in the State of Kentucky, almost precisely that of section 869, has recently been construed by the Supreme Court of that State. It was held that the fund was exempt whether garnished for the debt of a member or for an indebtedness due from one of his family. Schilling v. Boes, 85 Ky. 357.

Unless the construction we have determined upon, or that, at least, adopted by the court just mentioned, can be given to the words under consideration, they are wholly superfluous, and without meaning, at all times. In fact, without so construing them, the entire section would be valueless as a rule, because inapplicable to nearly all co-operative or assessment life insurance organizations. Almost without exception these associations provide in their articles of incorporation and in their membership certificates, as did this garnishee, that the fund shall be paid to his family upon the decease of a member. At no time has he an interest which may subject the money to the payment of his debts. On the other hand, construing the section as we have indicated gives it significance and effect as to each of these societies and associations; their plans are promoted, and objects encouraged; and they are the better enabled to accomplish their benevolent and charitable purposes. In addition to this, such construction is in harmony with all legislative action upon the subject of co-operative and assessment associations, as well as with the universal rule of construction that, when applied to such organizations, a liberal construction is required of their articles, and of the Statutes in favor of the objects of their bounty, and to prevent the application of their funds to the benefit of those who are strangers. The purposes and objects to be attained by such organization should not be defeated by a strict construction of their articles of association or of the Statutes. Jewell v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 41 Minn. 405; Supreme Council Am. L. of H. v. Perry, 140 Mass. 580, 1 New Eng. Rep. 715; Ballou v. Gile, 50 Wis. 614.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Fairfield County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the contract price for certain land quarried by defendant on plaintiffs' land. Reversed.

The lease under which this controversy arose was as follows:

"This agreement entered into by and between the parties following, witnesseth that Robert Crawford and S. E. Crawford, his wife, both of township nine, Fairfield County, and State of South Carolina, have this day leased to the Oman & Stewart Stone Company, a firm doing business in Nashville, Tennessee, with headquarters at Oman, Watson County, Kentucky, the exclusive right and privilege of quarrying granite on the lands owned by said Crawford and wife, in said township, for the term of ten years, with the privilege to the said Oman & Stewart Stone Company of renewal for another five or ten years, at their election, on the following conditions and terms, viz.: The said Oman & Stewart Stone Company are to have the exclusive right of quarrying granite on any part of the lands owned by said Crawford and wife that may appear to said Oman & Stewart Stone Company as proper and advisable. Said Oman & Stewart Stone Company are to have the right to build such houses, derricks or other machinery, roads, tramways or railroads, as may seem to them necessary in the operation of the quarry or quarries they may choose to open or operate. Said Oman & Stewart Stone Company are to have the right of way over the lands of said Crawford and wife for such roads, tramways or railroads as they may choose to make or travel over in conducting their business of quarrying. The right to use and remove any stone quarried or unquarried on the lands of said Crawford and wife in said township is hereby conveyed to said Oman & Stewart Stone Company. Said Company have the further privilege of cutting down and removing or using such timbers as may be on the ground or in the way of hauling granite. In consideration of the aforementioned privileges

The word "lamp," as used in a contract for the furnishing and use of natural gas, is to be construed with reference to the context, the time, place and habits of the people with reference to which it is used, and the popular understanding of the word in the localities where natural gas is generally used. Saltsburg Gas Co. v. Saltsburg (Pa.) 10 L. R. A. 198, and note.

The term "solid rock" is not uncertain or ambiguous; and in the absence of proof that it was used in any other than its plain and popular sense, proof of surrounding circumstances is not admissible on the question of its meaning in a written contract. *Fruin v. McIver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 22d of December, 1884, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a written agreement, styled a “lease,” a copy of which is set out in the case, and should be embraced in the report of this case. By the terms of this agreement the defendant, among other things, was to have the exclusive right of quarrying granite on the lands of the plaintiffs for the term of ten years, with the privilege to defendant of renewal for another term of five or ten years, at its election, in consideration whereof the defendant agreed to pay annually to the plaintiffs “one cent and one quarter of one cent for every cubic foot of granite shipped of dimension stone during the first five years of this lease, and one cent and one half of one cent per cubic foot of dimension stone during the second five years and all subsequent terms of this lease. For all other stone shipped not dimension stone they agree to pay fifty cents per carload.” The defendant, having worked the quarry for some two or three years, abandoned it, whereupon this action was commenced, on the 31st of January, 1889. In the complaint the plaintiffs undertook to state two causes of action,—the first for breach of the written contract in not paying the price agreed upon for the stone quarried, and the second for damages for ceasing to work the quarry. But as the second cause of action has been practically eliminated by the ruling of the circuit judge on the motion for a new trial, to which no exception has been taken by the plaintiffs, we are confined to a consideration of the first cause of action. In support of this cause of action the plaintiffs, after alleging the making of the written contract, substantially as above stated, except that feature which prescribes the price of stone shipped other than dimension stone, allege that defendant “has quarried 200,000 blocks of granite, known as ‘Belgian blocks,’ and that said defendant has already shipped 110,000 of said Belgian blocks, and is ready to ship, and is preparing to ship, the remaining 90,000 of said blocks.” They then proceed to allege that the 200,000 Belgian blocks “so quarried by the defendant are equivalent to 86,000 cubic feet of granite; that said Belgian blocks are ‘dimension stone,’ and that there is due and payable to the plaintiffs by the defendant, under said agreement, upon the said 86,000 cubic feet of stone, the sum of $450;” for which sum judgment is demanded. Testimony was adduced tending to show how much stone had been shipped by the defendant, how much was at the quarry cut into Belgian blocks, but not shipped, and also as to what was the meaning of the term “dimension stone,” which seems to be a term of art, as to which there was considerable conflict among the witnesses. The plaintiff Robert Crawford, who, as agent for his wife, his co-plaintiff, seems to have had entire charge of the business, testified that he regarded Belgian blocks as dimension stone, but there is no testimony that the defendant so regarded them. The circuit judge charged the jury that the defendant was liable, not only for the stone actually shipped by them, but also for such as had been quarried and left at the quarry, using these words, “Whatever was quarried and ready for shipment may be considered in this contract as articles shipped;” and, as to the rate that should be charged for the Belgian blocks, while they were not dimension stone, yet if the testimony satisfied the jury that the term “dimension stone” was not used in its ordinary technical sense, but was intended to embrace Belgian blocks, then they could so find, and allow the plaintiffs to recover for the Belgian blocks, at the rate fixed by the contract for dimension stone. The jury having found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the whole amount claimed, $450, defendant appeals upon the following grounds: “(1) For that his honor erred in charging the jury that, if the 75,000 Belgian blocks were quarried, then whatever was quarried and ready for shipment may be considered in this contract as articles shipped, and that the plaintiffs could recover therefor against the defendant. (2) In that his honor erred in this: that having charged the jury that, the parties being quarrymen, there was a presumption that they contracted with reference to the technical meaning of ‘dimension stone,’ and having charged, further, that Belgian blocks were not ‘dimension stone’ in its technical sense, it was error to submit to the jury the question whether the plaintiffs had rebutted this presumption, when they had offered no testimony whatever to rebut the same.”

The action being based upon a written contract, it is quite clear that the rights and liabilities of the parties must be determined by the terms of such contract, and it seems to us equally clear that, under the provisions of this contract, the plaintiffs had no right to demand, and the defendant was under no obligation to pay for, any stone until it was shipped or sent to market, for such is the express provision of the contract. It does not provide that defendant shall pay for the stone when it is quarried, or even when it is prepared for market, but only when it is "shipped." Such being the contract of the parties expressed in no equivocal terms, we do not see by what authority a court can undertake to change those terms. It may have been, and doubtless was, a very material matter to the defendant that it should not be required to pay until the stone was shipped, as it may have been dependent for the means of paying for the stone upon its sales of the same, and the proceeds of such sales could scarcely be realized before the stone was shipped. Again, it is not difficult to understand that one of the material elements which entered into the calculation of the defendant, in making a contract in reference to such a heavy and unwieldy article, would be the rates of transportation which it might be able to obtain, and hence there might have been a very good reason for inserting in the contract the provision that the defendant was to pay only for the stone shipped. The testimony shows that the defendant was largely dependent for transportation upon a private railroad, which not being under the control of the public authorities of the State, its owners could fix any rates they pleased, and thus effectually destroy the business of the defendant; and in fact there is testimony from one of the owners of this railroad, who was interested in a rival quarry, that the rates of transportation on that railroad were raised for the express purpose of putting an embargo on the business of the defendant, which did have the effect of stopping its operations. In view of this contingency, which the testimony shows must have been known to both parties, it seems to us that the contract, as it was written, and as, we think, it must be construed, so far from being an unreasonable one, was just the reverse, and that the insertion of the provision whereby the defendant was only to pay for the stone shipped was a very prudent and proper precaution, in view of the contingency above mentioned, which, as the event proved, did happen; for it can scarcely be supposed that the defendant intended to bind itself to pay for stone which it could not get to market except by paying such rates of transportation as would effectually destroy the profits of the business, and perhaps bring it in debt every year. It may be that it was an unwise contract on the part of the plaintiffs to make their pay contingent upon the amount of stone shipped, without first taking measures to secure such rates of transportation as would enable the defendant to carry on the business with reasonable success; but courts do not sit for the purpose of relieving parties from unwise bargains, and when parties of full age and capacity, without fraud or imposition (of which there is no pretense here) enter into a contract, they will be held to its performance according to the terms inserted in such contract, unless, perhaps, it is so wholly unreasonable and unconscientious as to afford a presumption that the parties must have intended something different from that which the words they used clearly import. But, as we have said, we do not see anything so unreasonable in the terms of this contract, as written, as would afford any ground for such a presumption. The suggestion made by the circuit judge that the parties could not have contemplated that the defendant should work the quarry from year to year, taking from it blocks of stone of any kind, and become the owners of such blocks without becoming responsible for the payment of the contract price therefor, and hence that whatever stone was quarried and ready for shipment may be considered, under this contract, as shipped, and consequently that if there were, as estimated, 75,000 Belgian blocks left at the quarry, the defendant was liable to pay the contract price for the same, cannot be approved. In the first place, we do not think that it necessarily follows that the defendant would "become the owner of such blocks;" for if the defendant has abandoned the work, as the testimony shows, leaving that, or any other, number of Belgian blocks at the quarry, we do not see how it would become the owner of the same. On the contrary, if such is the case, we see no reason why the plaintiffs may not resume possession of the quarry, together with all the stone left there which had been taken out of the quarry and cut into Belgian blocks, and, if so, then the plaintiffs have been benefited, rather than injured, thereby. But, be all this as it may, we think that, the parties having clearly expressed in writing the terms of the contract, which do not appear to us to be so unreasonable as to warrant a court in changing those terms, they must be held to the plain meaning of the terms they have used; and hence that the circuit judge erred in instructing the jury that whatever stone was quarried and ready for shipment may be regarded as shipped, under the terms of this contract, and that defendant was liable to the plaintiffs for the contract price of the same.

It seems to us, also, that the second exception is well founded. Inasmuch as the contract prescribed one price for dimension stone and another and much lower price for all other stone, it was of course very material to determine what was meant by the term "dimension stone," and especially whether Belgian blocks were embraced in that term. Now, as the term "dimension stone" was a term of art, it was competent, under the well-settled rule, to receive evidence of experts as to the technical meaning of that term. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 280; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 867, 868, and notes. Accordingly such evidence was received in this case, and as it was conflicting, a question of fact was presented as to the meaning of the term "dimension stone," and especially whether it included Belgian blocks, which it was the province of the jury to determine; and it was for the court to instruct them as to the proper construction of the contract, accordingly as they found one or the other meaning of the term to be correct. It seems to us that the true rule upon this subject is well stated by Parke, B., in Neilson v. Harford, 8 Mees. & W. 806, in the following language, taken from one of the notes to the passage in the Encyclopedia above cited: "The construction of all written instruments belongs to the court alone, whose duty it is to construe all such instruments as soon as the true meaning of the words in which they are couched, and the surrounding circumstances, if any, have been ascertained as facts by the jury; and it is the duty of the jury to take the construction from the court either absolutely, if there be no words to be construed (or, perhaps, it would be better to say interpreted) as words of art or phrases used in commerce, and no surrounding circumstances to be ascertained, or conditionally, when those words or circumstances are necessarily referred to them."

This rule was illustrated in the case of Hutchinson v. Bowker, 5 Mees. & W. 535, where an offer had been made by letter to sell a certain quantity of "good barley," and the letter, in reply, after stating the offer, contained the following: "Of which offer we accept, expecting you to give us fine barley and good weight." And it was held that, although the jury might find the mercantile meaning of "good" and "fine," as applied to barley, yet they could not go further and find that the parties did not understand each other. The question whether there was a sufficient acceptance was a question to be determined by the court upon a proper construction of the letters, Parke, B., saying: "The law I take to be this: that it is the duty of the court to construe all written instruments. If there are peculiar expressions used in them, which have, in particular places or trades, a known meaning attached to them, it is for the jury to say what is the meaning of such expressions, but for the court to decide what is the meaning of the contract." So, as was said by Shaw, C. J., in Eaton v. Smith, 20 Pick. 150 (quoting again from the Encyclopedia): "When a new and unusual word is used in a contract, or when a word is used in a technical or peculiar sense, as applicable to any trade or branch of business, or to any particular class of people, it is proper to receive evidence of usage to explain and illustrate it, and that evidence is to be considered by the jury; and the province of the court will then be to instruct the jury what will be the legal effect of the contract or instrument as they shall find the meaning of the word modified and explained by the usage." It seems to us, therefore, that the circuit judge erred when he instructed the jury that while a Belgian block was not a dimension stone, if that word is to be interpreted in its technical sense, yet the question for the jury to determine in this case was whether the term "dimension stone" was used in this contract in its ordinary technical sense, or in some other sense. The written contract showed what terms had been used by the parties, and, in view of the fact that one of those terms—"dimension stone"—was a term of art, the only question for the jury was, What was the meaning of that term in the art to which it applied? and not whether the parties used that term in a sense different from that which it ordinarily bore. This would be allowing a party, by parol evidence, to prove that the understanding between the parties was different from that which the terms they have used ordinarily and properly import, which is not permissible, as it would be, in effect, varying the terms of a written contract by parol. See De Camps v. Carpin, 19 S. C. 131.

We must look alone to the written contract for the words used by the parties, and where some of the words are terms of art, it is for the jury to say, from the testimony adduced, what is the proper and technical signification of such terms, and there the province of the jury terminates, and it is for the court to determine the true construction of the contract, reading the terms of art used therein in the sense as thus ascertained by the jury. But the jury are not at liberty to say that, though the words used by the parties properly mean one thing, yet the evidence shows that the parties intended them to mean something else; for that would permit the jury to substitute for the words actually used by the parties other words which they have not used. In this case both of the parties who were active in making this contract were quarry-men, with considerable experience in the business, and, when they used a term of art, it must be presumed that they used it in its technical sense, and as it would ordinarily be understood by quarry-men, and, in the absence of anything in the contract itself indicating that they intended to use that term in any other or broader sense, this presumption is conclusive.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George T. SCOTT

v.

Benjamin P. ELDRIDGE et al.

(....Mass....)

1. Conspiring to commit an abortion is not a felony at common law.
2. An arrest for a past misdemeanor

NOTE.—Conspiracy.

An agreement to procure an abortion is not a felony at common law. Com. v. Demain, Bright. 441. See Reg. v. Banks, 12 Cox, C.C. 308. See note to Tennessee v. Jackson (Tenn.) 1 L. R. A. 370. 12 L. R. A.

cannot be made without warrant on the authority of a letter from a police officer of another State.

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings made by the Superior Court for Suffolk County during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for an alleged unlawful arrest and detention of plaintiff by defendants, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor, Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Thomas J. Gargan and Patrick M. Keating, for defendants:

Conspiracy to commit abortion is a felony in this State.

Pub. Stat. chap. 207, § 9.

If the letter from the Philadelphia police department furnished the defendants, who are unfamiliar with legal technicalities, with reasonable ground to believe that a felony had been committed by the prisoner in Pennsylvania, it was not necessary that the letter should in terms technically import a felony; it was sufficient if the language in its popular sense would import such an offense.

Com. v. Carey, 12 Cush. 246, 251.

While the States are foreign to each other for certain purposes, in respect of an arrest and detention for crimes committed, they are to each other as the counties in England, and the doctrine of the common law concerning arrest and detention should govern.

Com. v. Andrews, 2 Mass. 14, 19; Com. v. Upprichard, 8 Gray, 434, 438; Com. v. Holder, 9 Gray, 7; Com. v. White, 123 Mass. 430, 435.

In England, an officer has a right to arrest a person without a warrant if he has reasonable cause to believe that person has committed a felony either in the county in which he is arrested or in some other.

When a person who has committed an offense in one State has been found in another, it has been the frequent practice, on receipt of a request by telegraph or otherwise from an officer of the former State, to arrest the offender without a warrant and detain him to await the arrival of a requisition and an agent from the State where the offense was committed. This can be lawfully done.

State v. Anderson, 1 Hill, L. 327; Re Henry, 29 How. Pr. 135.

The information received by the defendants led them to believe that the plaintiff had committed a felony and justified the arrest without a warrant and detention for a reasonable time for the purpose of having him answer to a complaint for the offense.

Rohan v. Sawin, 5 Cush. 281, 287.

Whether there was reasonable cause for the belief entertained by the defendants that the plaintiff had committed a felony, and whether they detained him an unreasonable time without getting a warrant, are questions of fact which the court should have submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

Rohan v. Sawin, supra; Haskins v. Hamilton Mt. Ins. Co. 5 Gray, 432, 438; Douglas & Mfg. Co. v. Gardner, 10 Cush. 88-92; Spoor v. Spooner, 12 Met. 281, 284, 285; Ellis v. Paige, 1 Pick. 43, 49.

Messrs. George R. Swasey and James H. Flint, for plaintiff:

If the arrest could have been legal at the outset, it became illegal by defendants detaining plaintiff and discharging him without issuing any legal process against him, and, becoming illegal, it was so from the beginning.

Russell v. Hanscomb, 15 Gray, 166; Harris v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 119, 120; The Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Coke, 290; Oxley v. Watts, 1 T. R. 12; Melville v. Brown, 15 Mass. 82.

An officer to justify himself must make a true return of his doings.

Munroe v. Merrill, 6 Gray, 236; Brock v. Stimson, 106 Mass. 520.

The crime mentioned in the letter is not such as to constitute a felony.

Burrill, Law Dict. title Conspiracy; Bouvier, Law Dict. title Conspiracy; Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. title Conspiracy; Com. v. Shedd, 7 Cush. 514; Com. v. Smith, 11 Allen, 243.

A person charged in any State with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2.

No case can arise demanding a more searching scrutiny into the evidence than one arising under this part of the Constitution of the United States.

Ex parte Smith, 8 McLean, 186.

To justify the delivery of "a person charged in any State with crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State," it is necessary to have proof that the person did in fact "flee from justice." The evidence that the person has fled from justice must not only be satisfactory to the governor but must be legally sufficient before the executive authority can be exercised. He cannot act upon rumor, nor upon the mere representation of a person, nor upon the demanding governor's certificate. It should be sworn evidence, such as will authorize a warrant of arrest in any other case.

Re Jackson, 2 Flipp. 183; Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544.

The accused may "insist upon proof that he was within the demanding State at the time he is alleged to have committed the crime charged, and subsequently withdrew from her jurisdiction, so that he could not be reached by her criminal process."

Ex parte Reggel, 114 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 250; Ex parte Sheldon, 34 Ohio St. 319.

Every definition of "fugitive from justice" includes the element of flight in order to escape punishment or detection.

Bouvier, Law Dict. title Fugitive from Justice; Burrill, Law Dict. title Fugitive from Justice; Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. title Fugitive from Justice; State v. Washburn, 48 Mo. 240; United States v. O'Brian, 3 Dill. 381; United States v. White, 5 Cranch, C. C. 38; 6 Pa. Law Jour. p. 418; Moore, Extradition, §§ 573, 580.

Proof of flight must be established beyond a reasonable doubt.

Re Clark, 9 Wend. 221.

The alleged fugitive must have been charged with the crime in the State where it was committed. The word "charged" contemplates that the person arrested and delivered up committed the offense in another State, and is in such State charged either by indictment, information or accusation known to the law of such State before some court, magistrate or officer thereof.

Smith v. State, 21 Neb. 552; State v. Huford, 28 Iowa, 391.

Even if a warrant had been issued, that alone would be insufficient.

Tullis v. Fleming, 69 Ind. 15; People v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182; Ex parte Lorraine, 16 Nev. 63; Re Heyward, 1 Sandf. 701.

The prosecution must have been first begun in the State where the offense was committed. Ex parte White, 49 Cal. 433; Ex parte Oubeth, Id. 435.

And by indictment, affidavit or accusation. State v. Hufford, supra; Ex Doo Woon, 18 Fed. Rep. 898; Ex parte Morgan, 20 Fed. Rep. 298.

The affidavit must allege that the crime was committed in the demanding State, and that the accused committed it.

Ex parte Smith, 3 McLean, 121.

The executive is not authorized to make a demand unless the party was charged in the regular course of judicial proceedings.

Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U. S. 24 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 717; Malcolmson v. Scott, 56 Mich. 459.

By the common law of England neither a civil officer nor a private citizen had the right without a warrant to make an arrest for a crime not committed in his presence, except in the case of felony, and then only for the purpose of bringing the offender before a civil magistrate.

Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 29 L. ed. 458; Wright v. Court, 4 Barn. & C. 596; 1 Hale, P. C. 587-590; 2 Hale, P. C. 76-81.

An officer acting on irresponsible information acts at his peril and is no better off than any other citizen.

Malcolmson v. Scott, supra.

No one has authority without process legally issued in this State to arrest a person charged with crime in another State, and fleeing here for refuge.

State v. Shelton, 79 N. C. 605; Morrell v. Quarles, 35 Ala. 544.

Where preliminary arrest is regulated by statute, the law must be observed.

Moore, Extradition, § 597.

In Massachusetts there is a statute provision for a warrant.

Pub. Stat. 218, § 7.

Where the warrant was not in proper form, the arrest was illegal.

Price v. Graham, 3 Jones, L. 546; Ex parte Oubeth, supra; Harris v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 116.

Magistrates can issue warrants and order the arrest of fugitives before demand, and the implication at least is that such arrests cannot be made otherwise.

Com. v. Deacon, 10 Serg. & R. 135; Ex parte Romanes, 1 Utah, 23; State v. Buzine, 4 Harr. (Del.) 572.

Treating this crime as a felony, which it is not, failure to get a warrant, or take the prisoner before a magistrate at the earliest possible moment, rendered the party making the arrest a trespasser ab initio.

Cochran v. Toher, 14 Minn. 385; Hayes v. Mitchell, 69 Ala. 452; Ocean S. S. Co. v. Williams, 69 Ga. 251; Harris v. Atlanta, 62 Ga. 290; Re Henry, 29 How. Pr. 185; Burke v. Bell, 36 Me. 317; Potter v. Swindle, 77 Ga. 419.

Even if a warrant is obtained, if the wrong man is arrested, the arrest is illegal.

Harris v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 116.

Art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States "does not contain a grant of power. It confers no right; it is the regulation of a previously existing right. It makes obligatory upon every member of the confederacy the performance of an act which previously was of doubtful obligation."

Re Petter, 28 N. J. L. 311. See Com. v. Track, 5 Met. 586; Com. v. Hall, 9 Gray, 262; Hawley v. Butler, 48 Barb. 101; Ex parte Cubreth, 49 Cal. 435; Re Leland, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 64.

The Constitution and statutes of the United States provide only for the surrender of fugitives when a demand is made, and there is no provision or occasion for arrest until such demand is made. The laws are incomplete, and need further elaboration and explanation for practical purposes, and this is accomplished by local legislation, which is intended solely to further and interpret the United States statutes and Constitution.

Ex parte Ammons, 84 Ohio St. 518; Brown's Case, 112 Mass. 409; Ex parte Rosenblatt, 51 Cal. 285; Re Mohr, 78 Ala. 508.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case is shortly as follows: A letter came to the defendant Eldridge, who was the chief of the department of inspectors of the police of Boston, from someone who purported to be the chief of detectives of the police of Philadelphia, saying that a colored man named Robert Scott, alias George R. Scott, who was described in detail, was wanted, and asking that if found he should be arrested and charged with conspiracy to commit an abortion, adding, "I hold our coroner's warrant." In pursuance of this request, the defendants Eldridge and Robinson, the latter being an inspector under Eldridge, arrested the plaintiff, detained him for twenty-four hours, and then discharged him from custody without any legal complaint having been made or legal process issued. The plaintiff brought this action for the arrest. At the trial, the defendants contended that being a party to a conspiracy to commit an abortion was a felony according to the laws of Pennsylvania, and put in evidence Brightly & Purdon's Dig. p. 431, §§ 156, 157; and they asked the court to instruct the jury that if the defendants had reasonable ground to believe that the plaintiff had committed a felony in Pennsylvania they were justified in arresting and detaining him. The court refused to give this instruction and ruled that no justification was shown for the arrest. A verdict was accordingly returned for the plaintiff.

The statutes of Pennsylvania which were put in evidence relate to the offense of abortion, and not to that of conspiracy. No statute of Pennsylvania relating to conspiracy being shown, we must go to the common law to ascertain if such a conspiracy is a felony; and by the common law it clearly is not. Reg. v. Button, 11 Q. B. 929; People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 229, 265; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 240. There was therefore nothing to show that the defendants had any reason to think that the plaintiff had committed a felony. We cannot accept the defendant's suggestion in the argument, that the latter furnished ground to believe that the plaintiff had committed an abortion in Pennsylvania, which is a felony under the Statutes referred to. The letter is plain in its request to charge him with a conspiracy, which is an offense of a less grade than felony.

Even if the plaintiff had committed the offense of conspiracy in Massachusetts, the defendants would have had no right to arrest him without a warrant. On reasonable suspicion of felony a peace officer may make an arrest without a warrant, even though it turns out that in fact no felony has been committed; but he may not without a warrant make an arrest for a past misdemeanor, though the offense has been committed, unless he is specially authorized by statute to do so. Com. v. Carey, 12 Cush. 246, 252; Com. v. McLaughlin, 12 Cush. 615; Rohan v. Savin, 5 Cush. 281; Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 499, 29 L. ed. 458, 460; Samuel v. Payne, 1 Doug. 359; 1 Lead. Crim.

Cas. 157, and Bennett's note, 197 et seq. If a peace officer would have had no right to arrest the plaintiff for a past misdemeanor committed in Massachusetts, certainly he could have no greater right in respect to a misdemeanor committed in another State. So that, even assuming that the plaintiff had committed a misdemeanor in Pennsylvania (which was not shown), his arrest without a warrant was illegal.

This view of the case being decisive, we have no occasion to consider whether it is necessary in case of a felony committed in another State to pursue the course pointed out in the Statute (Pub. Stat. chap. 207, § 9), or the other objections urged by the plaintiff against the validity of his arrest.

Exceptions overruled.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

GLENN, Appt.,
v.
JACKSON et al.

(....Ala.....)

An innkeeper is not liable for the theft of a valise left by a transient guest who has paid his bill and gone away, although it was checked for him by a porter, where the latter had no authority to check it and no other person at the hotel had any notice that the valise was left.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham, in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover compensation for the loss of plaintiff's valise from the check room of defendants' hotel. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Responsibility of innkeeper as bailee.

Bailments for the benefit of the bailor, depositum or mandatum, are founded upon express contract, and require the assent of the bailee to make him responsible. In such case the bailee is required to use only slight care, and he can be made liable only for fraud or gross negligence. Heatherington v. Richter, 31 W. Va. 353.

To charge an innkeeper on the custom or common law of the realm for the loss of goods, (1) the inn ought to be a common inn; (2) the party ought to be a traveler or passenger; (3) the goods must be in the inn (and for this reason the innkeeper is not bound to answer for a horse put out to pasture); (4) there must be a default on the part of the innkeeper or his servants in the safe keeping of the guest's goods; (5) the loss must be to movables; and therefore if the guest be beaten at an inn the innkeeper shall not answer for it. Calye's Case, 8 Coke. 82 a; Indermaur, Epitome Lead. Com. Law Cas. 11.

To make one liable at the common law for goods lost at his inn, it must appear that the guest visited the inn for purposes which the common law recognizes as the purposes for which inns are kept. Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52.

A sleeping-car company, so far as it renders services similar in kind to an innkeeper, is subject to the same liabilities. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe (Neb.), 6 L. R. A. 800, and note.

For what property responsible.

The innkeeper is bound for the safe keeping of the beasts of the guest, and his goods; that is, his luggage, apparel, money, etc.; and if any of them are stolen or lost while the relation of host and guest continues, he must make good such loss or damage. Russell v. Fagan (Del.) 6 Cent. Rep. 335.

Goods within the outbuildings, and cattle within the yards belonging to the inn, which are the property of travelers stopping at the inn, are within the protection of the rule. Clute v. Wiggins, 14 Johns. 175; Hilton v. Adams, 71 Me. 19. 12 L. R. A.

Liability of innkeeper for property lost or stolen.

His responsibility for goods and moneys of his guest extends to moneys stolen from the guest, unless stolen by his servant or companion. Shultz v. Wall, 8 L. R. A. 97, and note, 134 Pa. 232.

He is, like a common carrier, an insurer of the goods of his guests, and nothing short of inevitable accident, casualty of war or the fault of the guest himself, can excuse him for their loss. Russell v. Fagan, supra.

Where a porter of a hotel receives from a traveler a check for baggage, the hotel proprietor at that instant incurs a liability for the safe keeping of such baggage and the limitation of the authority of the porter, unknown to the guest, forbidding him to receive baggage, is immaterial. Coskery v. Nagle (Ga.) 6 L. R. A. 483.

The failure of the guest to inform the porter that the baggage contains valuables is not such negligence as will prevent his recovery against the proprietor for its loss. Ibid.

When not liable.

An innkeeper as such is not liable to a guest for goods stolen from the latter from a sea-bathing house belonging to the former. Minor v. Staples, 71 Me. 316.

When the guest pays his bill and leaves the house to be gone a considerable time, and ceases to be a guest of the house, if money was left with the clerk without the knowledge of the proprietor, by a subsequent arrangement with the clerk, the proprietor would not be liable. Whitemore v. Haroldson, 3 Lea, 312.

A hotel keeper is not liable for the value of effects retained in his custody during the absence of a traveler who has taken a check or receipt therefor, if they are lost or destroyed by inevitable ac-

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carmichael & Thach for appellant.

Messrs. White & Howe for appellees.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts, briefly stated, are substantially as follows: Defendants were proprietors of the Florence Hotel. The plaintiff had been in the habit of stopping at the Florence Hotel as a guest for two or three days each week, for about a year, but under no continuous special contract. On the morning of the 23d of November, 1888, being in his room, the plaintiff rang the bell for a servant, and he handed his valise, in which was wearing apparel, etc., to the porter who responded to the bell call, with directions to take it down and check it, and leave the check for him at the clerk's office; that he soon after went down, found a check on the register, which the porter, who had taken his valise down, informed him was his check; that he settled his hotel bill with the clerk, surrendered his room, and left, without any contract that he would return; that two or three days afterwards he returned to the hotel, presented his check (No. 35) and called for his valise. The check-room was examined, but the valise could not be found. The number corresponding to 35 was in the check-room on a hook. The check-room was just opposite the office of the clerk, and was without a door, and was used only for storing and checking the baggage of guests. The evidence showed that plaintiff did not notify the clerk or anyone connected with the hotel, except the porter to whom he gave the valise, that his baggage was to be placed in the check-room, and the clerk who was on duty testified that he had no notice or knowledge that plaintiff's valise had been placed in the check-room. It was further in evidence that the servants and porters in the hotel had instructions neither to check nor deliver baggage without notice and permission of the clerk of the hotel who might be on duty. There was no other evidence tending to show that the valise was ever placed in the check-room, or when it was taken or stolen, or by whom. Plaintiff did not pay or agree to pay anything for keeping his baggage. The common-law liability of innkeepers, except so far as modified by statute, is recognized and applied in this State. Rates of charges, and reasonable limitations upon their liability, may be fixed by special contract. A guest may also be guilty of such proximate contributory negligence as to exonerate innkeepers from responsibility. Lanter v. Youngblood, 78 Ala. 592; Story, Bailm. §§ 483, 484; Story, Cont. § 744-749.

The strict common-law liability of innkeepers is for the protection of the goods of their guests, and while the relation of innkeeper and guest exist. The words of the common law were, eorum bona et catalla infra hospitium.

Relation of guest and host must exist.

The relation of innkeeper and guest exists if one takes his meals at the inn but does not reside there, even though he lives within the same town. Walling v. Potter, 35 Conn. 183.

Whether the plaintiff sustained the relation of guest or boarder in the defendant's inn at the time of the loss of the articles sued for, is a question of fact to be decided upon all the evidence. Hall v. Pike, 100 Mass. 496; Houser v. Tully, 62 Pa. 92. And see McDonald v. Edgerton, 5 Barb. 530.

Where a man arrived at Toronto from Ireland, and drove from the railway station to defendant's hotel, having a portmanteau with him, took a room, saying he only wanted it to change his dress and go to friends; and after having occupied it for an hour went to his friends, with whom he remained, he was not a guest. Lynar v. Mossop, 36 U. C. Q. B. 230.

One having no fixed residence, who arranges for a prolonged stay at a hotel at reduced rates payable by the month with the idea of determining if his wife's health will be benefited, and does not place his valuables with the innkeeper, is a boarder, and not a guest. Moore v. Long Beach Development Co. (Cal.) Jan. 19, 1891.

Guest, who is.

Everyone who is received into an inn, and has entertainment there, for which the innkeeper has compensation or reward, is a guest; but this includes only wayfarers or travelers. Russell v. Fagan (Del.) 6 Cent. Rep. 885. See note to Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Lowe (Neb.) 6 L. R. A. 809.

A traveler who seeks and obtains stabling and provender for his beast for reward, although he himself lodges and boards elsewhere, is a guest in the legal sense, and entitled to the protection of his beast. Russell v. Fagan, supra.

If one comes to an inn and leaves his goods and horse, and goes into the town and afterwards returns, and in the meantime his goods are stolen, he may recover as a guest for the loss of his property. Geiley v. Clerk, Cro. Jac. 188.

The absence of a few hours is not material, but when he "goeth from hence for two or three days, although he saith he will return," he is not a guest. Dr. Sands' Case, 1 Salk. 124; Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 485.

This rule obtains where the property left at the inn was luggage, but it is otherwise where he left a horse from which the host derives an advantage. Wharton, Innkeepers, 78.

Not liable as a mere depositary.

An innkeeper is not bound to receive the goods of a person who desires the use of the inn only as a place of deposit. Bennet v. Mellor, 5 T. R. 274; Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 321.

Where his purpose is simply to deposit his money for safe keeping he is not a guest and cannot hold the proprietor liable. Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 3 West. Rep. 368, 44 Ohio St. 32; Carter v. Hobbs, 13 Mich. 53.

An innkeeper is not liable, as such, for the loss of money deposited with him for safe keeping by a person who is not a guest of the inn at the time such deposit is made, nor at the time the loss occurs. Ibid.

The clerk of an innkeeper has no authority to bind the latter, either as innkeeper or special bailee, for the loss of money deposited for safe keeping with such clerk by a person who is not a guest of the inn at the time of such deposit. Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, supra.

To entitle a person visiting an inn to be treated as a guest, and to hold the innkeeper responsible for money deposited for safe keeping, it must appear that such visit was for the purposes which the common law recognizes as the purposes for which inns are kept. Ibid. See Carter v. Hobbs, supra.

Calve's Case, 8 Coke, 32a; Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172.

The evidence in the present case shows that on each several visit of the plaintiff to the hotel, he was a guest, and was entitled to all the protection of the common law. It is equally clear that this relation terminated after each stoppage. He was charged and paid the usual day rates without reduction, and no agreement was made as to future visits. When the plaintiff paid his bill and left, the relation of innkeeper and guest ceased to exist. O'Brien v. Vasu, 22 Fla. 627. If, when he paid his bill, he had called for his valise, and it then had been stolen or lost, there could be no doubt of the liability of the defendant, or if he had requested the defendant or his authorized clerk to take charge of his baggage until his return, agreeing to return within a short time, and the defendant or clerk had consented to do so, a liability would have been assumed by such agreement. Story, Bailm. § 477, and note. Or if the plaintiff had not paid his bill, and the defendant had undertaken to retain the baggage to secure the plaintiff's debt to him, the defendant would be liable. Haas v. Taylor, 80 Ala. 465. And there may be cases, according to the particular circumstances, where an innkeeper may be liable for the goods of a guest, for a reasonable time, after the departure of the guest from the inn. Adams v. Clem, 41 Ga. 65. See criticism on this case in 22 Fla. 627, supra.

If a traveler, intending to become a guest at an hotel, meets a porter of the hotel at the depot or other usual stopping places for travelers, and intrusts his baggage with the porter, sent out for the purpose of soliciting patronage and caring for the baggage of such guests, the relation of innkeeper and guest for the protection of the baggage is thereby created; or if a guest, intending to leave the hotel, intrusts his baggage to a porter of the hotel whose duty it is to deliver the baggage at the depot, the relation is continued until the delivery at the designated place. But these principles of law afford no protection to one who intrusts his baggage to a mere servant of the hotel not authorized to receive baggage, with directions to him to check it for safe-keeping until he returns, then pays his bill to the clerk, and terminates his relation as guest, and gives no notice to the innkeeper or clerk that he expects to return, and that he has left his baggage to be taken care of until his return. "When a person came to an inn with a hamper of hats, and went away, and left them there for two days, and in his absence they were stolen, it was held that he was not to be deemed a guest, and that the innkeeper was not liable for the loss thereof." Story, Bailm. § 477.

It is not in the power of a bailor to force upon another the custody of his goods. It must be a duty voluntarily assumed or one imposed by law. A deposit received by a servant not in the line of his duty, and without the expressed or implied consent of his principal, and against positive instructions, cannot impose a liability upon the principal. In such case the deposit is a mere personal trust in the servant. There is nothing in the objection that the court permitted the defendant to assign other grounds of demurrer at the trial, which had not been previously assigned.

Affirmed.

NOTE.—Recording Acts: when instrument regarded as recorded; who suffers by failure of clerk to make record or by mistake in recording.

Each State appears to have its own rule on this subject, owing partly, perhaps, to the different language of the Recording Acts. But there is not difference enough in the language of the Acts to account for all the wide difference in the decisions. There is no rule or theory by which the decisions can be harmonized, and there is no rule which can be drawn wholly from the decisions, which can be taken as a basis for future decisions, and which will cover all phases of the subject. There is much to be said on both sides, and the courts appear to decide as the one view or the other is more prominently before them when first dealing with the question. As illustrating the difficulty of the question it may be said that in very few of the leading cases were the members of the court unanimous in opinion, many strong dissenting opinions appearing in the books. Under these circumstances it would seem that more value could be derived

A statute making a conveyance "operative as a record" from the day of its delivery to the recording officer protects the title of the holder of a mortgage which has been so delivered although the mortgage is copied upon the record as a security for a smaller amount than it was given to secure. Mims v. Mims, 35 Ala. 23.

Such delivery places the legal and equitable rights of the mortgagee precisely on the same basis as if his mortgage were fully and accurately recorded without even a mistake. Fouche v. Swain, 80 Ala. 153. See also McGregor v. Hall, 3 Stew. & P. 397; Duboe v. Young, 10 Ala. 368; Turner v. McFee, 61 Ala. 468; Heflin v. Slay, 73 Ala. 130; Leslie v. Hinson, 83 Ala. 268.

Under a statute making a mortgage a lien from deed for record from the grantee mentioned therein is, as to the recording of such deed, to be considered the agent, not of subsequent bona fide purchasers, but of such grantee, within the rule that when one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must fall upon the one under whose control it happened, and who had it in his power to avert it.

3. The record of a deed is not complete under Gen. Laws 1880, pp. 313, 314, 315, §§ 18, 19, 24, so as to constitute constructive notice of its existence, until it has been filed, recorded and entered in the index book as prescribed by those sections.

Under a statute providing that every conveyance properly recorded shall from the time of filing the same for record impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof, constructive notice is given only of the facts appearing on the face of the record, and one will not be charged with notice of portions of a deed which through mistake are not entered in the record. *Chamberlain v. And such is the rule in Colorado. Weese v. Barker, 7 Colo. 181.

One who carries a deed to the town clerk to be registered is not to be prejudiced by the negligence of the clerk in permitting the deed to lie in his office unrecorded. Franklin v. Cannon, 1 Root, 500; Judd v. Woodruff, 3 Root, 298.

Under a statute that no deed shall be good against any person but the grantor unless it be recorded at length in the records of the town where the lands lie, and that the register shall, on receipt of a deed brought to him for record, note thereon the date of such receipt, and the record shall bear the same date, a deed delivered for registry secures title to the grantee from the day it was so received, without reference to the time when it was in fact recorded (*McDonald v. #### Per Curiam:

The first question to be decided in the consideration of this case is, Does a grantee, who deposits his deed for record in the auditor's office, where it is received by that officer, discharge his duty of notice to the public, so that his title cannot be prejudiced through the fault or negligence of the auditor in not recording said deed, in accordance with the requirements of the Registry Laws? If it is concluded that he does so discharge his duty, and that constructive notice is thus given, it will be conclusive of this case; and it will not be necessary to enter into the question of whether or not the index is an essential part of the record. It will be seen that important questions arise here affecting valuable rights, and that, whichever way they are decided, a hardship will be imposed upon an innocent party. In one instance the first grantee relies on the officer, who is a creature of the law, to do his duty; and in the other, the purchaser, reposing faith and confidence in the correctness of the record, acts upon it. Shall the deed prevail, or the record of it? On the first question there is a somewhat perplexing conflict of authority; some side purchasers, and that the recorder shall keep a book in which he shall index all instruments left for record, every deed being deemed recorded from the time so indexed, the entry in the index book will not be notice of the contents of the deed after it is spread upon the records, and the grantee will be bound by a mistake of the recorder in recording the instrument. Gilchrist v. Gough, 63 Ind. 533. See also State v. Davis, 93 Ind. 543; Smith v. Lowry, 12 West. Rep. 621, 113 Ind. 44.

An Act providing that an instrument shall from the time of filing the same for record impart notice to all persons of its contents will not make such filing notice after the instrument is recorded, at least if it is then withdrawn from the files, and a subsequent purchaser has a right to rely on the record even though it contains mistakes of the clerk. Miller v. Bradford, 12 Iowa, 19.

A mortgagee must see that his mortgage is properly recorded. Barney v. McCarty, 15 Iowa, 515. See also Miller v. Ware, 31 Iowa, 324.

Under a statute providing that when recorded in the office of the register of deeds every title paper shall from the time of filing the same for record impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof, the grantee has done his whole duty when he leaves his deed and has the same indorsed for record, and he cannot be prejudiced by the recorder's delay in actually spreading the deed upon the records. Poplin v. Mundell, 27 Kan. 159; Lee v. Birmingham, 80 Kan. 312.

Under a statute making a deed good against purchasers or creditors "when lodged with the clerk to be recorded" the grantee's title cannot be prejudiced by the clerk's permitting the deed to be taken from his possession before recording it by a third person without the grantee's knowledge. Kentucky Bank v. Haggis, 1 A. K. Marsh. 306.

Under an Act providing that mortgages are all lowed to prejudice third persons only when they have been publicly inscribed on records kept for that purpose in the manner directed by law, a mortgage is valid against third persons, not as it was executed, but as it stands recorded. Succession of Falconer, 4 Robt. (La.) 7; Taylor v. Hotchkies, 2 La. Ann. 917.

But under Acts providing that deeds shall have effect from the time they are deposited in the proper office and indorsed by the proper officer for record, a deed deposited in 1872 and not recorded until 1876 will protect the grantee against subsequent judgments against his grantor. Payne v. Pavey, 29 La. Ann. 116.

Whether or not it is recorded in the proper book is immaterial. Lewis v. Klatz, 39 La. Ann. 259.

Under a statute providing that a mortgage shall be considered as recorded at the time it is left for such purpose in the clerk's office, the mortgage is notice only as recorded, although prior to the time of its being recorded the mere fact that it is filed for record may be sufficient notice of its contents. Sawyer v. Pennell, 19 Me. 173.

Under a statute providing that the clerk shall record mortgages in a book kept for that purpose, noting in the book and on the mortgage the time when the same was received, failure to note the time of receipt in the book will postpone the mortgage in favor of attaching creditors until the noting is made. Handley v. Howe, 22 Me. 522.

A mistake in recording a mortgage binds the mortgagee. Stedman v. Perkins, 42 Me. 151; Jones v. McNarrin, 63 Me. 338; Hill v. McNichol, 73 Me. 311.

Under a statute providing that no deed shall be valid for the purpose of passing title unless "recorded as herein directed" the grantee will be bound by mistakes of the clerk in making the record. Brydon v. Campbell, 40 Md. 336.

Under a statute requiring the recorder to keep a courts holding that a deed is recorded, in contemplation of law, when it is entitled to registration, and is deposited with the recorder in his office for that purpose, and if, through any fraud or neglect or mistake of the recording officer, the proper notice is not conveyed to a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, that the misfortune will fall upon the subsequent purchaser; while other courts hold the opposite doctrine, that the onus is on the grantee, who deposits his deed with the recorder, to see that every step is taken, and every act done, that is prescribed by the Registry Laws. For collated authorities on this question, see Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 597; Wade, Notice, pp. 70-78.

In many of the cases, however, that are cited as holding the doctrine claimed by plaintiff, the courts, on a careful investigation, are found to have based their opinions on statutes materially different from ours, and others, on the peculiar circumstances of the case. The enunciation by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Lytle v. State of Arkansas, 50 U. S. 9 How. 815, 13 L. ed. 153, that "it is a well-established fact that where an individual in the prosecution of a right does everything which the law requires him to do, and he fails to obtain his right, by the misconduct or neglect of a public officer, the law will protect him," has been largely relied upon by the plaintiff, and has been quoted by a majority of the cases reported, which hold to plaintiff's view, but in none of these cases, that we have seen, have the circumstances of that case, which called forth the opinion, been reported. To get the full scope and meaning of this expression, we must not regard it as a segregated proposition, independent of the case under consideration, and applicable to all cases; for judges in rendering opinions, use expressions with reference to the application of principles involved in the case under consideration, and the language employed must be construed, and its meaning gathered, from an examination of the questions involved, the circumstances surrounding and the argument that leads up to the utterance, or, in homely phrase, it is necessary to know what the court was talking about. Of course, there are certain underlying or basic principles of law, from the true deductions of which are constructed legal maxims, which may be stated as independent propositions, and which will admit of no modification; but the examination of the case cited shows that the quoted utterance of the eminent judge has no application to the principles involved in, and the circumstances surrounding, this case. That was a case where a pre-emption claimant tried, through a succession of years, to obtain title to some fractional subdivisions of land, and was prevented, not by any negligence of the register and receiver in the land office, but on account of their construction of the law, and circular instructions from the general land office. Afterwards, by Act of Congress granting a thousand acres of land to the State of Arkansas, for the purpose of building a courthouse, the governor selected and sold the land in controversy to one Russell, under whom the defendants held. Of course, many interesting questions were raised during the trial of this book in which he shall enter in the order received all title papers left for record, and providing that every instrument shall be considered as recorded at the time so noted, after the recording officer places upon a deed his certificate that it has been received for record, in contemplation of law the whole world has constructive notice of it just as if it had been accurately copied in full upon the records, and it is immaterial that the clerk afterwards fails in his duty by recording it inaccurately, by omitting material portions of it or even by altogether suppressing it from the records. Gillespie v. Rogers, 6 New Eng. Rep. 297, 146 Mass. 612, citing Tracy v. Jenks, 15 Pick. 463; Ames v. Phelps, 18 Pick. 314; Jordan v. Farnsworth, 15 Gray, 517; Fuller v. Cunningham, 105 Mass. 442; Adams v. Pratt, 109 Mass. 56; Wood v. Simons, 110 Mass. 118; Sykes v. Keating, 118 Mass. 517; Getchell v. Moran, 124 Mass. 404.

A purchaser has a right to rely on the records as showing the exact facts, notwithstanding a mistake has been made in recording. Barnard v. Campau, 29 Mich. 164.

Where statutes provide for the keeping of an entry book for mortgages and that as soon as a mortgage has been entered therein it shall be regarded as recorded, and also provide for the recording in full, an omission in the record of the name of the mortgagee will not prejudice his security if his name properly appears in the entry book. *Sinclair v. Under a statute requiring a deed to be recorded to be good against subsequent purchasers the record of the deed is notice of its contents only so far as the record discloses them. Parret v. Shaubhut, 5 Minn. 331. See also Thorpe v. Merrill, 21 Minn. 336.

Under a statute declaring instruments void "as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, unless they 12 L. R. A.

shall be acknowledged or proved and lodged with the clerk of the chancery court of the proper county to be recorded, the grantee fully acquits himself of all duty imposed by law when he lodges the instrument with the proper officer for record, and he cannot suffer loss from an error of the clerk in recording it. Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 596. But see Lally v. Holland, 1 Swan, 401.

Under a statute providing that every instrument recorded in the manner prescribed shall from the time of filing the same with the recorder for record impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof, a record is notice only of the facts appearing on its face, and if a mistake occurs in recording the grantee must suffer the consequences. Terrell v. Andrew County, 44 Mo. 309.

Under statutes providing that deeds shall be recorded in the order and as of the time when they are delivered to the clerk for that purpose, and shall be considered as recorded from the time of such delivery, and further making it the duty of every person to have his deed entered upon the numerical index and pay the fees before it can be recorded, the grantee's duty is discharged when he deposits his deed for record and pays the fees, and he cannot be prejudiced by the recorder's failure to record the deed. Perkins v. Strong, 22 Neb. 726.

Under a statute providing that a designation of a school site by selectmen shall be binding when their report designating a location "shall be recorded in the books of the town," the duty of the selectmen is discharged when the report is filed for record, and the subsequent neglect of the clerk to make a due record will not affect the validity of the location. Converse v. Porter, 45 N. H. 369.

Under a statute providing that the registry of a mortgage must contain, among other things, "the mortgage money, and the time or times when payable," and that no mortgage shall defeat or prejucase; but the particular circumstances of the case, which called out the quoted utterance, and the intended applications of the principles therein enunciated, can probably be gathered from the balance of the paragraph following the quotation, which is as follows: "In this case the pre-emption right of Cloyes having been proved, and an offer to pay the money for the land claimed by him, under the Act of 1890, nothing more could be done by him, and nothing more could be required of him under that Act; and, subsequently, when he paid the money to the receiver, under subsequent acts, the surveys being returned, he could do nothing more than to offer to enter the fractions, which the register would not permit him to do." Thus it will be seen that none of the principles involved in the case at bar were involved in that case, and it shows the misleading tendency of quoting detached sentences from the opinions of courts. In that case, the action of Cloyes was at every step a matter of public record, and of official report, and the whole circumstances of the case show that the defendants had actual notice of his claim, though some of them denied such a notice in the answer, while others admitted that they had heard of his claim, but believed it to be fraudulent; but the court spoke with reference to the acts of an officer acting in a judicial capacity, and deciding questions of law, decisions and acts over which the plaintiff could not possibly exercise any supervision or control. It will certainly not be hard to see that a very different rule might obtain, when the act required by the applicant was purely ministerial, and which he had a right to see was done in the manner prescribed by law. It is doubtful if the judge who rendered that opinion would have concluded that the grantee "had done everything which the law required him to do," when he contented himself with simply handing his deed to the auditor, without exhibiting any further concern about it. In our judgment, the scope and meaning of this opinion have been entirely misconstrued, when applied to this character of cases.

In Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 598, and one of the best argued cases sustaining the doctrine that the onus is on the purchaser, and a case which is also largely quoted, the court bases its opinion on the peculiar language of the Mississippi Statute, which declares that certain instruments "shall be void, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved, and lodged with the clerk of the chancery court of the proper county to be recorded." Here the Statute seems, by express terms, to make the lodging of the properly proved instrument with the clerk the proof of constructive notice. And thus it is with a great majority of cases cited in favor of plaintiff's theory. A close examination of them will show that the opinion is based upon some express language of the Statute, which would justify the conclusion reached; but, on the general proposition, however, the decided weight of authority seems to be in favor of the view that the record can be relied upon by subsequent purchasers, without actual notice the title of third persons "unless the same shall have been duly registered," the registry is notice of its contents and no more;" hence a mortgage for $3,000 recorded as for $300 will be valid as against subsequent mortgages without notice only for the latter amount. Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 268, 1 L. ed. 148; Beekman v. Frost, 18 Johns. 584. See also Peck v. Mallama, 10 N. Y. 519.

Under a statute directing that mortgages shall be recorded in the order in which they are delivered to the clerk for recording, the record of a mortgage upon a page which should have been devoted to a mortgage several years antecedent in execution is not notice to a subsequent mortgagee in good faith. *New York L. Where the statute requires the clerk to number mortgages given him for record, the rights of the mortgagee cannot be impaired by the clerk's failure to perform his duty. Dodge v. Potter, 18 Barb. 202.

In Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Dake, 87 N. Y. 264, the court remarked that under a statute providing that a deed shall be considered as recorded from the time it is delivered to the clerk for record, if before the record is actually made the deed should be mislaid or lost or purloined the record would still remain complete. Slight and immaterial mistakes in the recording of a grant will not avoid it. Van Pelt v. Pugh, 1 Dev. & B. L. 210; Hughes v. Debnam, 8 Jones, L. 181.

Where a purchaser of land hands his deed to the recorder and the latter by mistake misstates the name of the grantor in his record, the record will not be constructive notice to subsequent purchasers. Jennings v. Wood, 20 Ohio, 281.

Under statutes requiring recorders to keep a 12 L. R. A.

book in which an immediate entry shall be made of every deed brought to be recorded, mentioning the date, etc., and providing that no mortgage shall be a lien until left for record, parol evidence is not admissible to contradict the entry of the date of receipt as made in the book. Musser v. Hyde, 2 Warr. & S. 314.

A regular mortgage entitled to record is a record the moment it is left for record and so continues for all time to come, although it may not be actually recorded for months, and a mistake in the actual record by which the mortgage is given a date earlier than that upon which it was received will not avail the mortgagee. Brooke's App. 64 Pa. 127.

It is not incumbent on the mortgagee to supervise the recorder and see that the mortgage is recorded and indexed. Wood's App. 82 Pa. 116.

The fact that an instrument is indexed in the wrong book does not invalidate its record. In contemplation of law it is recorded and takes effect from the time it is left with the recorder for the purpose of being duly recorded. Sheble v. Bryden, 4 Cent. The lodging of a deed with the town clerk to be recorded is equivalent to an actual entry of it upon the record and the title is made complete, and the clerk's neglect to record it cannot affect the grantee's rights under the deed. Nichols v. Reynolds, 1 R. I. 30.

A corrected record is notice to third persons only from the time the correction is made. Baldwin v. Marshall, 2 Humph. 116.

A statute making a deed valid only from the time notice, and that constructive notice cannot be given by an attempt to comply with the Registry Laws. And this view we think is supported by right reasoning, and founded on principles of equity and justice.

As is most admirably stated by Mr. Jones, in his work on Mortgages: "Registry Laws are intended to furnish the best and most easily accessible evidence of the title to real estate, to the end that those designing to purchase may be fully informed of instruments of prior date, affecting the subject of their contemplated purchase; and also that, having availed themselves of this means of knowledge, they may rest there, and purchase in absolute security, provided that they do so without knowledge, information or such suggestion from other facts as would be gross negligence to ignore of some antecedent conveyance or equitable claim." The recorder cannot be considered the agent of the purchaser, as is asserted by some of the authorities. It is a much fairer construction of the law, and more in harmony with the law of agency generally, to consider him the agent of the party who has the business transaction with him, who gets him to do the work. And to him he should be responsible for any damage flowing from his refusal or neglect to do the work according to the contract between them; and that contract is, either express or implied, that the instrument shall be recorded according to law. That is what the grantee pays him to do, and he must see to it that his work is done right, or accept the consequences as between himself and third parties, who are misled. It cannot be said that the purchaser is alone subject to damages from the non-recording of the instrument. The very object in having it recorded is to give constructive notice to innocent purchasers, and to protect the grantee's title against said purchasers. The law imposes upon him the duty of having his deed recorded. It is not the attempt to record a deed that the law requires; but it is the recording of the deed. It would be an empty benefit, indeed, that would accrue to the buying public if the attempt to record were held to take the place of the record. The obligation rests upon the grantee to give the notice (required by the law. He controls the deed. He can put it on record or not, as he pleases. He has the right and the opportunity to see that the work is done as he directs it to be done, in legal manner. No one else has this opportunity, and if, from any cause, he fails to give the notice required by law, the consequences must fall on him. It may be a hardship; but, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the rule is that the misfortune must rest on the person in whose business, and under whose control, it happened, and who had it in his power to avert it. Any other rule would be abhorrent to our natural ideas of right, and would render perilous every business enterprise. The fact that the recorder gives to the grantee a certificate that the deed is properly recorded does not relieve him of the responsibility of seeing that it is actually so recorded. The certificate binds no one but the recorder, and cannot possibly, under any known rule of law or ethics, affect the rights of an innocent pur-

it is proved or acknowledged and delivered to the clerk of the proper court to be recorded, makes registration constructive notice only of what appears on the face of the deed as registered. Lally v. Holland, 1 Swan, 401. But see Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 595.

The withdrawal of a deed by the grantee after the date of filing has been noted, but before it is recorded, postpones it until it is returned to the register's office. Hickman v. Ferrin, 6 Coldw. 149. See Gaskill v. Badge, 3 Lea, 144.

Under statutes requiring the register to keep a book for the registration of trust deeds, and providing that when a deed is noted and registered it is notice to all the world from the time it is noted, the registering of a trust deed in the chattel mortgage book will not affect the grantee's rights. Swepton v. Exchange & Dep. Bank, 9 Lea, 723. See also Woodward v. Boro, 18 Lea, 678.

Under statutes making deeds good only from the time they have been properly acknowledged and delivered to the clerk for record, from which time it shall be considered as recorded, and requiring the clerk when an instrument is deposited for record to enter in a book provided for that purpose a description of the instrument, and after recording it to enter it in the index book, the grantee is not compelled to see that the recorder does his duty, and if he fails to make a record or index, the grantee will not be prejudiced thereby. Throckmorton v. Price, 28 Tex. 609.

But if the instrument has been defectively recorded so as to leave out material portions of it the record will be notice only of the existence of such an instrument as appears upon it. Taylor v. Harrison, 47 Tex. 453.

it becomes necessary, and imposing penalties upon him for refusal or neglect to make the record or to give a copy or permit inspection of a record, if the clerk records an instrument delivered to him for that purpose in a book which has long been considered filled and ceased to be used for recording purposes, and does not index it, it is not properly recorded and will not be notice to third persons. Sawyer v. Adams, 8 Vt. 173.

Where a deed of the east half of a lot is recorded as a deed of the west half, the record will not be constructive notice of the actual transfer which was made. Sanger v. Craigue, 10 Vt. 555.

When an officer left his deputation and oath with the county clerk for record, the record will be constructively deemed to exist from the time the instrument was lodged for record, although the record was not actually made until nine months later; the distinction is between those cases where the record is made essential in working a transmission of title or in creating or defeating a right—in which case nothing is effectually accomplished until the records are completed,—and those where it is required for purpose of public notice,—in which case if the deed is ultimately recorded it is deemed of record from the time it was filed for that purpose. Ferris v. Smith, 24 Vt. 81.

So a deed left with the clerk to be recorded will be regarded as recorded at the date when it was left, although not actually recorded until nearly two years afterwards. Bigelow v. Topliff, 25 Vt. 232.

A deed withdrawn from the files by the grantee before it is actually recorded will be postponed until it is returned. Johnson v. Burden, 40 Vt. 567.

chaser, who cannot be bound by a transaction to which he is in no sense a party, of which he has no knowledge, and for which he is in no way responsible. As we before intimated, it might aid the grantee in recovering damages from the auditor, but could do no more than that. The record is the essence of the law. The recorder is only a convenient instrument for the use of those whose duty it is to make the record. If, under the law, a public record were kept, where every grantee was required to come and record his deed, he could certainly not plead his own mistakes or negligence, and the only reason why every man is not allowed to record his own instruments is simply that the record can be kept in a legible, orderly and presentable manner; and the law provides one man to do the work for the many, or, in other words, makes the one man the agent for the many, and who does the work at their instance, and under their pay and control. It is true that, in another department of his work, he may be said to be the agent of the purchaser, or searcher of the records; for the law also makes him the custodian of the record books. Every man has a right to see the records, and the law, for the purpose of preserving the records, and assisting the searcher of the records, constitutes the recorder their keeper, who, at certain hours, found by the law to be reasonable, must exhibit them to all who wish to see them, and must also certify to what the record shows, when requested so to do, and paid for said services; and if, in the exercise of either of these duties, he either misrepresented the books, by exhibiting false or blind records, or made a false certificate, whether through fraud or negligence, the person for whom the service was rendered must suffer the damage, if any flow from the negligent or fraudulent act, and his only remedy is against the recorder for damages. A employed the recorder to search the records, and the recorder certified to A that the record title to a certain tract of land stopped with, and rested in, B, upon the strength of which A purchased of B, for a valuable consideration, said land, and it afterwards eventuated that C had a good deed on record for the same land, which the recorder overlooked. No well-regulated court would, we think, hold that the title of C would be jeopardized by the mistaken certificate of the recorder. We cannot conceive how the inconsistency or injustice would be diminished by holding that the innocent purchaser did not have a right to rely on the true record, or that the grantee would be protected by the false or mistaken certificate of the recorder.

With this view of the case, it becomes necessary to investigate the next question involved, viz.: Is the index an essential part of the record, under the Registration Laws of this State? On this proposition, also, there is conflict of authority, though the conflict in many cases is more seeming than real; for, as with the first question discussed, a great many of the decisions, which are cited as in point on the abstract principle, prove, upon close investigation, to have been decided upon statutory provisions differing materially from ours. And as constructive notice, by means of recorded instruments, depends wholly upon statutory provisions, we will first examine the Statute in force at that time. The Statutes in force at the time of the alleged constructive notice will be found in the Session Laws of 1869, on pages 818, 814 and 815, and the sections to be construed in this case are as follows: "Sec. 18. The auditor of each county in this Territory shall record, in a fair and legible handwriting, in books to be provided by him for that purpose, at the expense of the county, all deeds, mortgages and other instruments of writing required by law to be recorded, and which shall be presented to him for that purpose, and the same shall be recorded in regular succession, according to the priority of their presentation, and, if a mortgage, the precise time of the day in which the same was presented shall also be recorded. Sec. 19. Upon the presentation of any deed, or other instrument of writing, for record, the auditor shall indorse thereon the date of its presentation, . . . and, when such deed, or other instrument of writing, shall be it may never, in fact, be recorded, but is lost by negligence of the clerk or other accident. Beverley v. Ellis, 1 Band. 106. See also Horsley v. Garth, 2 Gratt. 491.

Under statutes requiring a register to keep general indexes in which he shall make correct entries of every instrument received by him for record immediately upon the receipt of such instrument and providing that the instrument shall be considered as recorded when so noted, a mistake of the recorder in copying the instrument into his book after it is correctly indexed will not impair its effect as notice. Shove v. Larsen, 22 Wis. 142.

But leaving a tax deed for record and having the date of its reception indorsed thereon is not a record of it so as to prevent a redemption from the tax sale, if it has not been spread at large upon the record or entered in the general index. International L. Ins. Co. v. Seales, 27 Wis. 640.

A registry which would be sufficient in case of any other deed is sufficient in case of a tax deed. Where the index referred to the record of the deed for a description of the property, the record was of force from the time the deed was actually recorded in full. *Oconto County v. recorded, the recorder shall indorse thereon the time when recorded, and the number or letter and page of the book in which the same is recorded." Section 20 prescribes the penalty for failing to record when fees are tendered. Section 21 provides for keeping a seal, and making copies of records. Section 22 directs the turning over the records to successor in office. "Sec. 23. Each auditor shall, upon the written demand of any person, make out a statement in writing, certified under his hand and the seal of his office, of all mortgages, liens and incumbrances of kind of record in his office, in relation to any real or personal property, in relation to which the demand shall be made; and if said statement shall be incorrect, he, and the sureties upon his official bond, shall be liable to the person aggrieved for all damages sustained by him in consequence of such incorrect statement, to be recovered in a civil action. Sec. 24. Each county auditor shall keep a general index, direct and inverted. The index direct shall be divided into seven columns, with heads to the respective columns, as follows:

"He shall correctly enter into such index every instrument concerning or affecting real estate, the names of the grantors being in alphabetical order. The inverted index shall be divided into seven columns precisely similar, only that the names of the grantees shall be alphabetically arranged, and occupy the second column. Sec. 25. Whenever any mortgage, bond, lien or instrument incumbering real estate has been satisfied, released or discharged from record, whether by written release across the record, or upon the margin thereof, or by the recording of an instrument of release, or acknowledgment of satisfaction, the auditor shall immediately note in both the indices, in the column headed 'Remarks,' opposite to the appropriate entry, that such instrument, lien or incumbrance has been satisfied." These different sections were not only all passed at the same session of the Legislature, but are all incorporated in one Act, and must therefore be construed together; and, construing them as a whole, we conclude that sections 18, 19 and 24 intended to provide a system for the registration of deeds and other instruments affecting real estate, the compliance with which would be constructive notice to strangers. The Act points out several successive steps to be taken by the auditor, when the instrument comes into his possession, before his duty with reference to it is accomplished: (1) he must file it for record, noting the time when it was presented for record; (2) record it in a fair, legible hand, in a book provided by the county for that purpose; (3) correctly enter it into an index book provided for that purpose, showing the time of reception, names of the grantor and grantee, nature of the instrument, volume and page where recorded and description of the property; and all three of these successive steps must be taken before the record is complete. The other sections which we have quoted are simply directory to the auditor, or affect, simply, the auditor, and the person with whom he is dealing; but the three requirements specified above are for the direct and only purpose of giving notice to the public. They are vital provisions, essential to constitute constructive notice. The appellee's counsel cites section 4 of the Act of November 9, 1877, which is as follows: "All deeds and mortgages shall be recorded in the office of the county auditor of the county where the land is situated, and shall be valid, as against bona fide purchasers, from the date of their filing or recording in said office, and when so filed or recorded shall be notice to all the world;" and argues from that that legal notice is given simply by filing the deed with the county auditor, and that no other notice is necessary. If that view could be entertained, it would practically render the provision, in regard to recording, a nullity; for the notice would be complete when the instrument was filed, and no man would go to the unnecessary expense of recording, and the record would soon become a voluminous and unapproachable mass of loose papers. There was evidently no such contemplation by the statutes. The auditor has twenty days within which to record the deed after it is filed, and it is the evident meaning of the law that it would be notice by virtue of the filing only during the interim of twenty days, at the expiration of which time it is presumed to be recorded, and the deed can be withdrawn, when the record becomes the notice. Or, as is more elegantly stated by Judge Dillon, in Barney v. McCarty, 15 Iowa, 519, in construing a similar statute: "As the filing is but one step in a series of steps, this language presupposes, and is in fact based upon the assumption, that the other, and, in the order of time, the subsequent, requirements of the law will be observed." The Iowa Statute was substantially as ours, except that the recorder was required to keep a "fair book," in which he entered every deed, giving date, parties and description of land, in addition to an index with about the same requirements as ours. So that there was really more chance for an innocent purchaser to be put on his guard, under their Registration Laws, in the absence of the index, than under ours; and yet the supreme court of that State has uniformly held that the index was necessary to give constructive notice. We are strengthened in our opinion that the index is an essential part of the record necessary to give notice by the provisions of section 25, which require that the satisfaction of instruments affecting real estate shall be noted in the index. The Legislature, recognizing the importance of the index, and the universal custom of depending upon the index, in searching the record, required that every step taken, both as to conveying, incumbering and releasing real estate, should be made to appear briefly on the index. It is asserted by plaintiffs "that the general construction placed upon statutes similar to ours is that the index constitutes no part of the record, and that a grantee cannot suffer from any error or omission in it;" and, in defense of this proposition, cites: Mugrove v. Bonaer, 5 Or. 313; Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 472; Chatham v. Bradford, 50 Ga. 327; Curtis v. Lyman, 24 Vt. 338, and Devlin, Deeds, §§ 695-697.

In the first case cited (Mugrove v. Bonser) the court decided: first, that a deed, which had been acknowledged in Washington Territory by an officer, other than a commissioner of deeds for Oregon, where the deed did not have the certificate of a certifying officer of a court of record under seal that the acknowledging officer was such officer as he represented himself to be at the time of said acknowledgment, was not entitled to record under the Statute, and therefore did not give notice; second, that the Recording Acts of Oregon only protect persons who act in good faith; and, third, cited a case of Hastings v. Cutler, 24 N. H. 481, holding that, where a defective deed had been recorded, while it did not operate as constructive notice of the conveyance it might operate as actual notice, and the court, in the case above cited, said: "But if, by means of that registration of the defective deed, the defendants had actual notice of the plaintiff's title, they are charged with the notice. When the defendants found the copy of the plaintiff's deed on record they must have understood that the intended record was to give information that such a deed had been made, and that plaintiff claimed the land under it. This must be regarded as actual notice, such as every reasonable and honest man would feel bound to act on." There is no suggestion of an index in the case; but it is plain that on the other proposition, which we have already considered, the plaintiff's case does not fall within the reason upon which this conclusion is based. In that case, it might be urged with some degree of justice, that there was enough revealed by the record to put the purchaser on his guard, and, once being notified of the conveyance, it would be his duty to investigate; and if, from such investigation, the will of the grantor could be gathered, he would not be an innocent purchaser if he purchased contrary to such revealed will. But, in the case at bar, the very instrument by which this notice is given is wanting, and the avenues of knowledge are closed up.

In Bishop v. Schneider, the court holds that the index is no part of the record, asserting that the proper office of the index is what its name imports, to point out the record; "that the grantee has no control over the official acts of the recorder, and, when he delivers his deed to the officer, he has performed all the duty within his power." But the court states that this decision is based alone on the construction of the statutes of that State, and they are materially different from ours, both with regard to the definiteness of the index concerning deeds, and the absence of the requirements to note the satisfaction of mortgages, and other instruments affecting real estate, in the index. Altogether their statute does not make the index so important a part of the system of registration as ours does. Their statute also provides that, when an instrument is filed with the recorder, it shall be considered as recorded from the time it is delivered. The opinion in this case quotes approvingly the case of Sawyer v. Adams, 8 Vt. 172. There, the town clerk copied a deed, delivered to him for record, on a book which had ceased to be a book for recording for a number of years, and, for the purpose of concealment and fraud, did not insert the names in the index or alphabet. It was held that the deed was not recorded, and was not notice to after-purchasers. This is indorsed by the Missouri case, on account of the fraud that was perpetrated. But it seems to us that it makes little difference, so far as the equities of the innocent purchaser are concerned, whether the obscurity of the record was the result of fraud or negligence on the part of the recorder. Certainly there is no logical basis for such a discrimination. The rights of the purchaser must depend upon something more tangible, and more easily ascertained, than the motive of the officer. Evidently, the idea upon which the decision in this case was based was that the searcher of title had been misled by the state of the record. But, as a practical fact, he would have been no more liable to have been misled by reason of the deed being recorded in an unused book than if it had been recorded in the proper book, and not indexed. The recording in the unused book was an unnecessary act of caution on the part of the recorder in his attempt to deceive.

In Chatham v. Bradford, 50 Ga. 327, while the court, to a certain extent, argues the general proposition, insisting that an index is only a means of access to the record, and that ease of access is "holly a question of degree, it says "that many of the records of that State have no index; that their Acts for the recording of deeds do not any of them require the clerk to keep an index;" and states, in conclusion, that they put their decision mainly on their own statutes, and on the condition of the records and the uniform practice of that State. They also approvingly cite Sawyer v. Adams.

Curtis v. Lyman, 24 Vt. 388, cited by plaintiff on this point, we have been unable to obtain; but, from reference to it in other cases, we conclude that their statute is different from ours in reference to indexing. Considering the difference in the statutes, we think that none of the cases cited are directly in point. While it is true that Devlin, in his work on Deeds (sec. 696), seems to imply that an index is not necessary to give constructive notice, yet he evidently bases the idea not so much on the theory that the index is not a part of the record, as from his general conclusion that the obligation of the grantee, as to notice, ceases when he has filed his deed for record. And he qualifies this general statement by saying, "Unless the language of the statute necessarily leads to a different conclusion," a qualification, it seems to us, which renders meaningless the general statement; for, as constructive notice is purely statutory, it must necessarily follow that it is the "language of the Statute" that leads to one or the other of the conclusions. He cites Barney v. Little, 15 Iowa, 537, but says that "the decision in that case was founded upon the express language of the Statute of that State," intimating that, in a consideration of the Statute, the conclusion of the court was correct; and, inasmuch as our Statutes make the index a more important factor in the system of registration than does the Iowa Statute, we may fairly conclude that, under a statute like ours, this learned author would consider the index an essential part of the record. Indeed, upon a painstaking investigation, not only of all the cases cited by the plaintiff (except the Vermont case, above referred to), but of many others, we have been unable to find a case reported which decides that an index is not an essential part of the record, upon a statute substantially like the Registry Laws of 1869. It is true that in numerous cases it has been decided that, where an instrument affecting realty was not indexed, as required by law, the title of the grantees should not be disturbed. The greater part of such decisions, however, will be found, on examination, not to be based on the theory that the index is not a part of the record, but upon the broad principle that the recording officer is the agent of the subsequent purchaser, and that the grantee is acquitted, when he places his deed for record in the hands of the proper officer,—a position which, we think, is untenable for the reasons above given. It is urged by the court, in Schell v. Stein, 76 Pa. 398, in deciding the case adversely to the interest of the purchaser, that the provision for indexing the records is of comparatively modern origin, and that such provisions did not exist in the early Registry Laws. This, we think, is a good argument; but the application by the learned judge was in our judgment bad. The law was, no doubt, suggested by the necessity of some such provisions as the records accumulated, and, at the present day, considering the accumulations of deeds, mortgages and liens of all kinds, affecting real estate, and the rapidity with which titles are changing every day, if we give the effect of constructive notice to the record at all, the only practical way by which the public can obtain the benefit of that notice is through the medium of the index. Laws are enacted for the benefit of the citizen, not only in theory, but in practice. They are not intended as pitfalls for the feet of the unwary. The State provides in express terms for the keeping of this index; and its mandate to the auditor is to enter in said index, in alphabetical order, the names of the grantors and grantees. This law the citizen is aware of. He has a right to presume that the law has been obeyed. If there was no such law, and he had abundance of time, and untold patience, he might devote himself to the task of examining the vast accumulations of records, page by page; but with the law in effect, and the universal custom recognized, of examining the record through the index, if the instrument is not indexed, the law, instead of aiding and protecting the citizen, becomes a delusion and a snare, and a ready vehicle for collusion and fraud. It would be a policy worthy of the consideration of the ancient tyrant, who wrote his laws in small characters, and posted them so high that his subjects could not read them, while at the same time he held them accountable for their strict observance. In this connection, we cannot refrain from quoting the language of the court, in Barney v. McCarty, that "a deed might as well be buried in the earth as in a mass of records, without a clue to its whereabouts."

In Speer v. Evans, 47 Pa. 141, the court says: "As a guide to inquirers, the index is an indispensable part of the record, and, without it, the record affects no party without notice." This, we think, is the better view of the law. In this case, there is no question of actual notice, and applying the law, as we have found it to be, to the case at bar, it follows that the judgment of the lower court must be reversed.

The case is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to reverse the judgment.

Petition for rehearing denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

John C. PERRY

v.

Anna M. JENSEN, Admx., etc., of Carl L. Jensen, Deceased, Appt.

(....Pa....)

1. One who has been in the advertising business more than twenty years and has distributed pamphlets and samples, including some of a medical nature, for various business establishments in several large cities and in different States, is competent to testify whether or not 421,000 samples of a medicine for dyspepsia was a reasonable number to be furnished to an advertising agent in one year for his distribution. So also is a witness who for several years has been manager of companies which dealt in infants' food and pepsin preparations, and which he says have distributed many samples and at least a half million circulars throughout the United States in different localities.

2. An experienced advertiser and distributor of samples is competent to testify that distribution of samples of a medicine for dyspepsia through a district telegraph company is not a proper method of distribution by an agent to whom samples are furnished and whose contract requires him to use "his best reasonable endeavors to introduce and sell the medicine."

3. To prove that a contract to distribute samples of medicine for advertising purposes was not performed, a witness may testify that he made an investigation in the city to which the contract related at the time it is alleged to have been performed and could find no samples. But evidence of his complaints to the employer is incompetent.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach by defendant's testator of a contract having for its object the introduction and sale of a medicine manufactured by defendant's testator. Reversed.

NOTE.—Evidence; expert testimony.

It is difficult to lay down any rule in respect to the amount of knowledge a witness must possess; and the determination of this matter rests largely 12 L. R. A.

in the discretion of the trial court. Montana R. Co. v. Warren, 137 U. S. 848, 84 L. ed. 683; Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. v. Phelps, 130 U. S. 520, 32 L. ed. 1035; Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 128; Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 125 Mass. 544.

By the contract Jensen appointed Perry his sole and exclusive agent for the sale of an article manufactured by him known as Crystal Pepsin on the condition that Perry should use his "best reasonable endeavors to introduce and sell the same," and should devote his entire time and attention to that purpose.

In consideration of Perry's services, and the payment by him of the costs of introducing and selling the article he was to have a commission of one third of 95 per cent of the gross receipts.

Jensen agreed to supply Perry with sufficient samples of the article, and printed matter in the nature of advertisements relating thereto, as the same might be called for by Perry.

Jensen reserved the right to terminate the contract in case the sales during the first year did not amount to at least 500 gross of packages, and in each subsequent year during the continuation of the contract to at least 1,000 gross of packages.

The total sales during the first year amounted to only 154 gross and Jensen terminated the contract and appointed other agents.

During the first four months of the year Jensen furnished to Perry about 481,000 samples, and then refused to furnish any more for the reason that that was enough for the year. On the other hand, there was evidence tending to show that Perry intended to use 1,300,000 samples in the first year's work.

At the trial defendant offered to prove that at the time the distribution of samples was alleged to have been made in Philadelphia witness made an investigation but could find no samples, and that he went to Dr. Jensen and complained that the work was not being done. The action of the court in overruling this offer became the subject of the second assignment of error.

The other facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. William F. Johnson for appellant.
Mr. William S. Steuger for appellee.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was here before (126 Pa. 495), we held that it was error to reject proof that the quantity of samples furnished by Jensen, prior to the demand in August, 1886, was more than reasonably sufficient for the whole year's operations. We further said that "the agent may demand what is fairly and reasonably sufficient for the purposes of his undertaking and no more. . . . What is a reasonable quantity of samples for the purposes of the contract is, if the parties cannot agree about it, a question of fact to be settled by a jury." Of course such a question would have to be determined by testimony, and the testimony of persons acquainted with the business of distributing samples of goods of this class would be essential to the proper information of the jury. In point of fact such testimony was delivered on the trial, but some of that which was offered by the defendant was rejected, and of this complaint is made more especially in the third and fourth assignments of error. To the witness Lovey the defendant put the following question: Q. Is or is not 481,000 samples of medicine like this for the cure of dyspepsia, a reasonable or unreasonable number for distribution in any one year? This was objected to, but no ground of objection stated, and objection sustained, but for what reason is not stated. If the witness was incompetent because he had not shown sufficient experience to be able to testify, his rejection was proper, but if that does not appear the question should have been admitted. Upon turning to his preliminary testimony on the subject of his competency, we find that he testified he had been in the advertising business since 1866, that he had experience in the distribution of pamphlets and medical articles for general consumption, that he had distributed pamphlets for Dr. Palen, Starkey & Palen, for the Real Estate Investment Company, and all of Mr. Goodman's publications; that his experience as a distributor had extended beyond Philadelphia, and that he had distributed samples and pamphlets in Chicago, Baltimore and in Ohio. We cannot say of such a witness that he was entirely incompetent to testify in answer to the question propounded. Possibly his experience was not as great, or his judgment as good, as that of other witnesses having a larger experience, but that would be a matter to be determined by the jury after his testimony was heard. He would not be incompetent because he did have experience in the matter of advertising medical articles, and in the distribution of samples and pamphlets relating to them. We think it was error, therefore, to reject the question altogether.

And so, also, as to the fourth assignment. The witness Herbert L. Ford testified that he had had experience in putting out articles for general and special consumption by sample, advertising and otherwise. He said, further: "About January 1, 1886, I was retained as general manager of the New York & Chicago Chemical Company. During the succeeding year the article of infants' food was brought to my attention and a copartnership formed to place it on the market. In the pepsin business we did a large amount of sampling in the trade among the druggists. In the food business we made distribution of sample packages from house to house, worked through the mail and by other methods. . . . We sent circulars and have distributed samples, attended public exhibitions and made displays of preparations, and had contests to show their efficiency. . . . We have distributed, I should suppose, at least a half million circulars throughout the United States from first to last." In reply to questions by the court the witness said he had not distributed from house to house all over the United States, but he had distributed throughout the United States, not by universal sampling but in localities, that he was interested both in the food and pepsin preparations, and that the pepsin was delivered to the druggists, and the food to the trade and in localities. The learned court below thought the witness had not sufficient knowledge to testify as an expert, in reply to the question as to the sufficiency of 481,000 samples of an article like Jensen's Pepsin Tablets, as a reasonable quantity for distribution in any one year, and rejected him as a witness. We think the witness was competent, and that the objection of want of sufficient experience or knowledge would go to the effect of his testimony and not its competency. We sustain the third and fourth assignments.

The plaintiff had proved that he did a large part of his distribution through the American District Telegraph Company. The defendant disputed the efficiency of that mode of distribution and offered to sustain his contention by the testimony of witness Goodman, who had testified to his experience as an advertiser and distributor, and to his acquaintance with the methods pursued by the company in question. His testimony was rejected. It could hardly have been for lack of knowledge and experience, and as the offer was to prove that that method of distribution was not the best reasonable endeavor of the plaintiff to make distribution, it could not be said that the offer was irrelevant. By the terms of the contract Perry was to use his "best reasonable endeavors to introduce and sell" the Pepsin throughout the United States and to devote his entire time and attention to that purpose. His methods of distribution, therefore, were directly in issue and were liable to be impeached by the defendant if that could be done. We think the witness had sufficient knowledge and experience from which to testify on this subject, and that it was error to reject the question propounded under the first assignment.

We think the offer covered by the second assignment should have been received, as its tendency was to show that whatever methods of distribution were adopted by the plaintiff, they were not efficient so far as the City of Philadelphia was concerned. The complaint of the witness to Dr. Jensen, however, would not be competent, and that part of the offer should be rejected.

The second assignment is sustained except as to the communication to Dr. Jensen.

The fifth assignment is not sustained. The question of Brill's competency and reliability as a pepsin maker is not involved in this controversy and it is therefore irrelevant.

The sixth assignment is not sustained because the learned court below, in other parts of the charge, correctly said to the jury that if the plaintiff's demand for more samples was unreasonable and oppressive upon the defendant, he could not recover merely because the defendant refused compliance with such a demand, and the number already furnished, 400,000 and upwards, was stated in the charge. Whatever was demanded beyond that was left to the jury, as being within their province to determine, in support of the allegation that the number demanded was unreasonable.

There was some evidence in the case as to the reasonableness of a demand for 1,200,000, and the court simply said in this part of the charge, that the jury must determine whether such a number would be unreasonable. It is true it does not appear that such a number was specifically demanded by the plaintiff, but he did call for several hundred thousand more than the 481,000 already delivered, in his letter of August 3, 1886.

We are obliged to sustain the seventh assignment because, literally, the contract did require that in addition to the samples Dr. Jensen should furnish "printed matter in the nature of advertisements relating thereto," and that was an additional expense to which he was subject.

A similar reason requires us to sustain the eighth assignment. The learned court was slightly in error in stating Jensen's testimony to the jury. His testimony as actually delivered does not show that "he said to Perry that he had machinery which could make 25,000 a week," but only that he "could construct machinery to make 25,000 samples per week."

As this discrepancy might be material with the jury in considering the quantity which the defendant was reasonably bound to furnish, we cannot say it was harmless to the defendant for the court to state Jensen's testimony on the subject incorrectly in the charge.

The ninth assignment is not sustained. We are not referred, by the appellant, to any testimony tending to show that the statement of the court in this part of the charge was incorrect, and we have not discovered any.

We see no error in the answer of the court to the defendant's fourth point and therefore dismiss the tenth assignment. It would not follow that the verdict should be for the defendant, if the plaintiff was ignorant or unskilled in the business, and refused to take advice from others having a knowledge of the business. The practical question for the jury was whether Perry performed his part of the contract, and whether he did or not was to be determined by the jury, and so the court charged in answer to this point. The same consideration is applicable to the defendant's fifth point. It was not a question whether the plaintiff told the defendant that he had a friend worth a million who would go in with him, and that no such person did go in with him, but whether or not he performed his part of the contract. The considerations which pertain to that subject were fully and correctly expressed in the answers of the court to the ninth and tenth points of the defendant and in the general charge. The eleventh assignment is not sustained.

There was no error in the answer of the court to the defendant's sixth point and the twelfth assignment is not sustained.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back money paid defendant as commissions for selling real estate. Affirmed.

Plaintiff owned an estate in Philadelphia. Frank H. Massey was employed by Miss Louisa Drexel to negotiate for the purchase of such estate. Massey employed Smith to assist him in securing the property. Smith talked with Mrs. Cannell and offered to sell the place for her, he to have one half of all he could obtain over $80,000 for it. A sale was subsequently effected for something over $90,000, and Mrs. Cannell paid Smith $5,000 for his services.

Subsequently a claim was made by Miss

Drexel to recover the amount of this commission on the ground that Smith had been guilty of a breach of trust in acting for the other side after having been first employed by her. This was settled by the payment to her of $2,600.

Smith claimed to have severed his connection with the Drexels before he became agent for Mrs. Cannell, and also that he was frightened into making the payment which he did to the Drexels, in support of which he offered to show at the trial that he at no time admitted or believed that he was under any legal or moral obligation to pay anything to the Drexels, and that he at no time admitted to Massey or to anybody that he had not carried out in full the agreement he made with Massey, or that he was under any legal liability to pay money to Miss Drexel. The rejection of these offers became the subject of the second assignment of error.

Defendant also offered to show by Amos Shallcross that the property sold for from $10,000 to $15,000 more than it was worth. The rejection of this offer was also assigned as error.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

An agent who is relied upon to exercise, in behalf of his principal, his skill, knowledge or influence will not be permitted, without the full knowledge and consent of his principal, to undertake to represent the other party also in the same transaction. *Mechem, Ag. § 66, citing Raisin v. Per Curiam:

The defendant was a real estate broker and attempted to serve two masters. There is high authority for saying that this cannot be done. Matthew, 6:24. The plaintiff paid him a commission of $5,000 for effecting a sale of certain real estate in ignorance of the fact that he was also the broker or agent of the purchaser. When she discovered that he was acting in this dual character she brought this suit in the court below to recover back the money so paid, and succeeded. We have no doubt of the right to recover money paid under such circumstances. It is against public policy and sound morality for a man to act as broker for both parties unless that fact is fully communicated to them. The right to recover being established this judgment must stand unless some error was committed on the trial below by which the defendant was prejudiced. A careful examination of the record fails to disclose any such error. The court was not asked to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, and could not properly have done so in view of the evidence. This disposes of the first assignment.

The second is without merit. The payment of the $2,600 to the Drexels was a fact in the case. The defendant's belief as to his moral or legal liability to pay this money was not important. Nor was it material that he had never made any admissions "to the Masseys or anyone else" upon this subject. The testimony of the witness Shallcross was properly rejected. The plaintiff's right to recover did not depend upon the character of the sale, whether advantageous or otherwise. It rested upon the higher ground of public policy. Eberhart v. Searls, 71 Pa. 266.

The instructions complained of in the fourth and fifth assignments are free from error. The learned judge fairly submitted to the jury the question of plaintiff's knowledge of the defendant's dual character. There was abundant evidence of her ignorance upon this point to go to the jury. She testified distinctly that the defendant told her he was acting for her and for her alone. The defendant did not deny that he had been employed by the purchasers. His contention was that he had ceased to act for them before he entered the service of the plaintiff. This was a question of fact for the jury, and, unfortunately for the defendant, they did not take his view of it.

A bailee for hire is only responsible for ordinary diligence and liable for ordinary negligence, in the care of the property bailed. Clark v. United States, 95 U. S. 539, 24 L. ed. 518. See Jones, Bailm. p. 88; Story, Bailm. §§ 398, 399; Domat, Civil Law, lib. 1, title 4, § 3, para. 3, 4; 1 Bell, Com. 7th ed. pp. 481, 483.

It is the duty of one who hires a horse to another to give the latter a horse that is manageable and safe, and, if the horse has any vicious propensities, to inform the hirer of that fact; and he is liable in damages for any injuries resulting from his failure to impart such information. Kissam v. Jones, 56 Hun. 432.

If he gives him no notice of any vicious propensity of the horse except to tell him, in answer to an inquiry, that the horse is all right except a little "akeery," when he knows that the horse has a vicious habit, he will be liable for any injuries sustained by reason of such vicious habit. Ibid.

When there was a special contract of hiring expressly limiting the use to which the team might be put, and the contract was violated and the team injured in consequence, against the protest of the driver, the hirer is liable, although the driver was agent of the plaintiff. Fox v. Young, 4 West. Rep. 776, 22 Mo. App. 386.

In an action against the bailee of a horse for hire, for immoderate driving and improper care, where it was shown that defendant drove a greater distance than he engaged for, and that the horse was sound when engaged, but injured when returned, there can be no recovery unless the jury find that the horse was injured by improper use, care or driving. Malaney v. Taft, 6 New Eng. Rep. 922, 60 Vt. 571. See Hart v. Skinner, 16 Vt. 138; Towne v. Wiley, 23 Vt. 355. See note to Staub v. Kendrick (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 619.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. D. H. Pope for defendant in error.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Powell hired from Farkas a horse to ride from Albany to the Whitehead place, in the country, a distance of five miles, and was to return by 11 o'clock at night. When he arrived at the Whitehead place, he learned that the person he wished to see was at the Bryant place, three or four miles beyond, and he rode on to that point. He remained at the Bryant place some two hours and a half, and left there for Albany about half past 9 in the evening. On his return, and after getting between the Whitehead place and Albany, the horse fell in the road. After considerable trouble, he got the horse on his feet, and led him about three miles, and, when within about a mile of Albany, the horse again fell, and he had to obtain the assistance of two colored men, living near by, to again get the horse upon his feet. He then took the horse to the lot of one of these men, and left him there; and about daylight in the morning walked on to the town, and notified Farkas' stable-man where the horse was, and of his condition. The horse died within a day or two thereafter. Farkas brought suit against Powell, alleging, in substance, that he had ridden the horse three miles beyond the place he had hired him to go, and that by negligence or cruelty the horse had been so injured that he died. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that, on the afternoon when the horse was hired to Powell, it was sound and in good condition, moved off briskly down the street, and showed no signs of any disease, but that when returned the next morning it was lame, and could scarcely walk, and had a halter burn around one of its feet. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that he rode the horse moderately, never going faster than a trot; that at the Bryant place he hitched it to a post; that there was no halter or rope around its foot while in his possession; and that in returning from the Bryant place he rode the horse on a walk until it suddenly fell in the road. An expert in diseases of horses testified that, in his opinion, the horse was paralyzed, and that this may have been produced by straining. There was also evidence that, a day or two before the hiring, the horse had been used in hauling dirt. Powell also testified that about a year before he had hired another horse from Farkas to go to the same place, and rode three or four miles further than he intended to go, and that when informed of it on his return Farkas said it was all right, and did not charge him for the extra time or distance.

On this state of facts the trial judge charged the jury, in substance, that if Powell exercised ordinary care in riding the horse, and attending to it while in his possession, it did not make any difference whether he rode it beyond the Whitehead place or not; that, if Powell was not at fault in riding and in his attention to the horse, he could not be held liable because he went a greater distance than he had hired the horse to go, although it may have been injured by accident or otherwise, without his fault, in going this extra distance. The jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial. We think this charge was error. When Powell hired the horse from Farkas to go five miles to the Whitehead place, he had no right, under his contract, to go beyond that point without the consent of Farkas, and when he did go beyond it was at least a technical conversion, or a violation of his contract and duty; and, if the horse had been injured while beyond the point to which he was hired to go, Powell undoubtedly would have been liable, whether the injury was caused by his own negligence or by the negligence of others, or even by accident, unless he was forced to go beyond that point by circumstances which he could not control. For example, if a bridge had been washed away, or the road was impassable, and in consequence he had to take a longer road in order to go to the Whitehead place, he would then be liable only for his own negligence. This principle seems to be sustained by the following authorities: Story, Bailm. § 418 et seq., and authorities there cited; Schouler, Bailm. § 189, and authorities cited.

But the nice question in this case is, Would Powell, after having been guilty of a technical conversion or violation of his duty, and having returned within the limits of the original hiring, and the horse then sustained injury without other fault on his part, be liable? That would depend, in our opinion, upon whether the extra ride of six or eight miles to the Bryant place and back caused or materially contributed to the accident. If it did, we think he would be liable to the owner. The horse might have been well able to travel the five miles and return, but the six or eight miles extra may have fatigued him to such an extent as to have caused him to stumble and fall, and thus produce the injury. If, however, the extra ride did not cause or materially contribute to the injury, we do not think Powell would be liable, if guilty of no other fault. We can see no good reason to hold the hirer liable for an injury to the horse hired, which occurred, without his fault, after he had returned with it within the limits of his original contract, although he had been guilty of a technical conversion by riding it three miles beyond the point to which it was hired to go, the extra distance not causing or contributing to the injury. We have been unable to find any cause the facts of which are like the facts in this. Nearly all the cases which hold the hirer liable, when he has deviated from the terms of his contract, are cases in which he was negligent in fact, or willfully and wantonly misconducted himself, or had overdriven the horse, or destroyed or ruined the property while beyond the limit or in the course of deviation from the purpose of hiring. The cases cited in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error were all of this character. See Columbus v. Howard, 6 Ga. 213; Gorman v. Campbell, 14 Ga. 187; Collins v. Hutchins, 21 Ga. 370; Lewis v. McAfee, 33 Ga. 465; Malone v. Robinson, 77 Ga. 719. So, likewise, were nearly all the cases referred to in Schouler and Story, supra. The facts in those cases show that the property was injured or destroyed during the time it was being improperly used, or being used for a different purpose from that for which it was hired. The question whether this extra ride did or did not cause or materially contribute to the injury was for the jury to determine under the evidence and a proper charge by the court; and, the court by its charge having eliminated this issue from the case, we think a new trial should be granted.

Judgment reversed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

T. B. JONES et al., Appts.,

v.

William McEWAN.

(....Ky.....)

Acceptance, after inspection or fair opportunity to inspect it, of wheat furnished under a contract for wheat of a certain grade, precludes the buyer from denying that the contract was satisfied.

(March 31, 1891.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Clark County disallowing their counterclaim for alleged breach of warranty in an action brought to recover the contract price for certain wheat alleged to have been sold and delivered. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. L. H. Jones, for appellants:

The thing contracted for was No. 2 wheat, and not an inspection by the appellants. If the appellants could have shipped to another station, for the purpose of having an inspection, why could they not ship it to Newport News for the same purpose? The appellants were under no more obligation, by the terms of the contract, to see that the wheat delivered was No. 2 than the appellee was. If, as matter of fact, the appellants had inspected the wheat before receiving it, but for the warranty this might be construed to be conduct from which acceptance in fulfillment of the contract might be implied. But it would be interesting to know at what particular point along the line of that railroad this conclusive legal presumption of an acceptance attached.

See McKibben v. Bakers, 1 B. Mon. 120.

An express warranty, in sales of personal property, is never conclusively waived by any acceptance of the goods, unless perchance in some cases of known defects. A waiver may arise as a presumption of fact, but never as a conclusive presumption of law.

Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's ed. 1888, p. 607; Smith, Mercantile Law, p. 645; 1 Parsons, Cont. p. 629.

Benjamin on Sales, 853, says that the buyer may, after receiving and accepting the goods, bring his action for damages in case the quality is inferior to that warranted by the vendor.

It is not disputed that neither of appellants knew anything about grading wheat, and never graded, or attempted to grade, a grain of wheat in their lives; and for this reason they resorted to the precaution of requiring an express warranty, and clothed their contract in language which, according to all familiar rules of interpretation, cannot be misunderstood. Why should not this simple contract to deliver No. 2 wheat be interpreted as other contracts, according to the natural meaning of the language used?

See Benjamin, Sales, p. 565.

In the case of an express warranty it is not

NOTE.—Effect of acceptance of goods under contract of sale.

It is the duty of a vendee of goods sold upon condition as to the kind and quality, and also that they shall be satisfactory to the vendee, to examine them promptly, and, if they do not comply with the conditions and are not satisfactory, to notify the vendor within a reasonable time that he will not accept them. Rosenfield v. Swenson (Minn.) Jan. 5, 1891; Baker, Sales, 223. See McCormick Harvesting-Mach. Co. v. Chesrown, 33 Minn. 32; Lee v. Bangs, 43 Minn. 23.

A purchaser is bound to object to receive the goods within a reasonable time; and what is a reasonable time is a question for the jury. Gordon v. Clarke, 10 Fla. 179; Coleman v. Gibson, 1 Mood. & R. 168; Stevens v. Stewart, 3 Cal. 140; Chaffin v. Doub, 14 Cal. 384; Sawyer v. Nichols, 40 Me. 212; Dyer v. Libby, 61 Me. 45; Wartman v. Breed, 117 Mass. 13; Borrowdale v. Bosworth, 99 Mass. 381; Stone v. Browning, 68 N. Y. 604; Garfield v. Paris, 96 U. S. 557, 24 L. ed. 521.

The mere delivery of goods under an executory contract by the vendor to the carrier appointed by the vendee does not necessarily bind the latter to accept them, and on arrival the purchaser has the right of inspection, and to reject if they do not conform to the contract. Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 549.

It seems to be a universal rule that vendee has 12 L. R. A.

the right to inspect goods after their delivery, to see whether they are in accordance with the order; but if he sells the goods without inspection it is tantamount to their acceptance. Hill v. McDonald, 17 Wis. 97; Fletcher v. Ingram, 46 Wis. 191; Hoffman v. King, 58 Wis. 314.

Defects not discovered by the inspection actually made, and not discoverable by such as ought to have been made, are properly classed as latent. Hence corn, musty and "blue-eyed," packed in bulk beneath sound corn, is a latent defect in the whole lot as a carload, delivery and acceptance being made without breaking bulk or unloading the car. Miller v. Moore, 6 L. R. A. 374, and note, 83 Ga. 684.

A delay of six weeks, after an examination and discovery as to the kind and quality of goods sold and delivered, in notifying the vendor that they are not satisfactory and will not be kept by the vendee, is unreasonable and amounts to an acceptance of the goods. Rosenfield v. Swenson (Minn.) Jan. 5, 1891. See Baylis v. Lundy, 4 L. T. N. S. 176; O'Brien v. Barker, 4 New Zeal. Jur. N. S. 64, cited in Baker, Sales, 223.

If within a reasonable time he rejects the goods as not being according to order, the fact that he had insured them will not amount to an acceptance. Bacon v. Eccles, 48 Wis. 227. See notes to Studer v. Bleistein (N. Y.), 5 L. R. A. 702; Campbell Print. Press Co. v. Thorp (Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 645.

necessary for the vendee to return or even offer to return the article sold, to enable him to recover the damage he has sustained by a breach of the warranty.

In O'Bannon v. Relf, 7 Dana, 820, and Dana v. Boyd, 2 J. J. Marsh. 598, there was no express warranty, but merely the warranty implied by law when an order is given for goods to be manufactured and delivered in the future.

There is no waiver of warranty by acceptance.

Day v. Pool, 52 N. Y. 416.

If the description is a material part of the contract, if it was an inducement to the contract, the parties' liability is fixed, and the law of conscience and the law of the land require that the parties should comply with their contract.

Words of description imply a warranty that the property shall answer the description.

Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262; Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's ed. p. 510.

Mr. George B. Nelson, for appellee:

The acceptance by the purchaser, after an inspection of the articles or an opportunity to inspect them, is a waiver of any objection on account of defect in quality.

There is no question of warranty in the case. The appellee did not warrant the quality of the wheat. He agreed to deliver wheat of a certain quality and grade. When he tendered the wheat it was an offer to perform his contract, and an implied claim that the wheat was of the specified grade. The rights of the purchaser thereupon were, to accept the offer, which made an end of the matter, or to reject the offer and hold the seller liable for his failure to perform his contract.

A warranty applies only to a sale of a specific thing, and not to a contract to sell and deliver at a future day a thing which is to be of a certain kind and quality. An agreement to sell and to warrant the quality when delivered is quite a different matter.

O'Bannon v. Relf, 7 Dana, 820; Dana v. Boyd, 2 J. J. Marsh. 598; Kerr v. Smith, 5 B. Mon. 558; Sprague v. Blake, 20 Wend. 64; Hart v. Wright, 17 Wend. 277; Benjamin, Sales, §§ 918, 1842, 1848.

A description in an executory contract of the article to be sold will not amount to a warranty,—that is, an agreement to sell with warranty,—unless such appears to have been the intention of the parties.

Maxwell v. Lee, 34 Minn. 511; Norton v. Dreyfuss, 7 Cent. Rep. 785, 106 N. Y. 90; Studer v. Bleistein, 48 Hun, 577; Kent v. Friedman, 1 Cent. Rep. 718, 101 N. Y. 610.

Acceptance with opportunity to inspect is a waiver of right to recoup for defect in quality.

Thompson v. Libby, 85 Minn. 443; Maxwell v. Lee, 34 Minn. 511; Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 43 Hun, 71; Comstock v. Sanger, 51 Mich. 497.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, grain and commission merchants of Winchester, purchased of the appellee, engaged in the same general business at Pine Grove and Colly stations, on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, all the wheat that the appellee had engaged in the vicinity of these stations, which was to be delivered at said stations in carload lots, and to grade No. 2 wheat. The appellee delivered said wheat at said stations, and it was there received by the appellants, and they personally inspected a part of the same as it was delivered, and pronounced it all right. They caused the wheat to be shipped to Newport News,—the place of destination,—where it was inspected and pronounced—at least a part of it—not No. 2 wheat in that market. The appellee sued the appellants for a balance of the purchase money, to which they pleaded, as counterclaim and set-off, that, as by the terms of the contract the wheat was to grade No. 2 at Newport News,—the terminal point,—and as it did not grade No. 2 at said point, they were damaged in the sum of $649. The appellee contended that by the terms of the contract the wheat was to grade No. 2 at the place of delivery; and the appellants, after inspecting, or having an opportunity to inspect, the wheat at said place, received the same in discharge of appellee's contract, which released him from all damage, etc. The question as to whether at the terminal place or that of delivery the wheat was to grade No. 2 having been passed upon by the jury, and they having decided from the evidence that the grade was to be at the place of delivery, we must regard that fact, for the purpose of this review, as settled. So the question arises, Conceding that the wheat did not grade No. 2 at the place of delivery, did the reception of it by the appellants at the place of delivery, after having inspected it, or after having had a fair opportunity to inspect it, satisfy the terms of the contract to deliver wheat of No. 2 grade?

This court in the cases of Dana v. Doyd, 2 J.

J. Marsh. 594; O'Bannon v. Relf, 7 Dana, 390, and Kerr v. Smith, 5 B. Mon. 553,—which have been subsequently incidentally approved by this court in a number of cases; also Benjamin on Sales (the text; see §§ 600-609, 4th ed.)—has held that where there is a contract to deliver goods or chattels of a particular description or quality at a future day, and the vendor tenders goods not of the agreed description or quality in discharge of the contract, and the vendee, after inspecting them, or after having had a fair opportunity to do so, receives them in discharge of the contract, he cannot thereafter maintain an action against the vendor to recover damages for the defects in the description or quality. The stipulation that goods of a certain description or quality are to be delivered is made an essential part of the contract, which must be complied with by the vendor as a condition preceding the obligation of the vendee to receive the goods and pay for them; and if the goods tendered in discharge of the contract do not come up to the terms of it as to description or quality, the vendee has a right to reject them, and hold the vendor responsible in damages; but if he, after having inspected them, or after having had a fair opportunity to do so, receives them in discharge of the contract, although they do not, as to description or quality, comply with its terms, he thereby waives these defects, and he cannot recover damages on account of them. For this rule, as it seems to us, the sound and equitable reason is given, to wit: When the vendor tenders the goods in discharge of the contract, and they do not come up to the stipulation, if the vendor, after having inspected them, or after having a fair opportunity to do so, would reject them, the vendor in many cases could comply with his contract by delivering other goods of the contract description or quality; or, in the absence of such right or opportunity, he would have the opportunity to take charge of them, and dispose of them himself, rather than confide the sale of them to the vendee, whose interest might be to have recourse on the vendor, and to handle the goods with that view alone, or his business capacity might be such that the vendor would not be willing to trust him. But if the vendee, after inspecting, or having a fair opportunity to inspect, the goods, were allowed to receive them in discharge of the contract, and then hold the vendor responsible for actual or supposed defects by exposing him to actions on the warranty on account of the defects, but really to recover losses resulting from short-sighted speculation or the wayward changes in the market, after he had been led to believe that all was satisfactory, would be most inequitable. Hence to regard the stipulation as an essential part of the contract, a compliance with which precedes the vendee's obligation to receive the goods; but if he receives them in discharge of the contract, after having inspected them, or after having had a fair opportunity to inspect them, the terms of the contract are complied with, and he has no action on account of the fact that the goods are not as stipulated, serves the rights of all parties. Of course this rule supposes that there is no fraud, and that the vendee has had an opportunity to inspect the goods. It is true there are many States that hold such stipulations to be warranties, and that fact was doubtless known to members of this court at the time the decisions mentioned were rendered; but nevertheless they chose to hew out the more equitable rule, regardless of those high opposing authorities. Besides, as there is scarcely any uniformity of decision among the several States upon the same subject,—many sometimes deciding one way, and only a few the other,—if we were to undertake to overrule our repeated and long-standing decisions to make a rule to conform to what is supposed to be the rule of the majority of the States, we would find ourselves overturning many long-standing legal landmarks of this State. Besides, instead of this State having an appellate court, some other State would practically fill that position for us. Which one should it be?

Statement by Vann, J.:

This was a proceeding instituted by the District Attorney of the City and County of New York to compel the administrator of the estate of one Worthington Romaine, deceased, to pay taxes upon certain collateral inheritances, pursuant to chapter 488 of the Laws of 1885, as amended by chapter 718 of the Laws of 1887. September 27, 1888, said Romaine died, unmarried and intestate, at Petersburg, Va., leaving as his only next of kin a brother and a sister, residing in this State, and two nephews and a niece, who were nonresidents. For at least ten years prior to his death he had been a resident and domiciled in the State of Virginia, but no letters of administration appeared to have been issued or applied for in that State. At the time of his death, and for about three years prior thereto, he was the lessee of a box in a safe-deposit company in the City of New York, in which he kept certain securities, consisting of stocks and bonds of different corporations, and a mortgage upon real estate in said city, as well as several pass-books showing deposits by him in various savings banks in the same place to a considerable amount. It did not appear whether said stocks and bonds were issued by foreign or domestic corporations. That part of said property so invested or kept in this State to which his nephews and nieces were entitled, being one third of the whole, was appraised at the sum of $23,742.15. October 12, 1888, letters of administration were issued upon his estate, by the surrogate of the City and County of New York, and when this proceeding was initiated the administrator had distributed the most of the assets among the next of kin. December 6, 1889, an appraiser was appointed, and upon his report a decree was made by the surrogate, imposing a tax of 5 per cent upon the shares of the nephews and niece of the decedent, and the administrator was directed to pay the same. Upon appeal to the general term the decree was affirmed, and the administrator thereupon appealed to this court.

Mr. Robert L. Redfield, for appellant:

The Statute expressly limits and restricts taxation on collateral inheritances (in cases of intestacy) to such as are effectuated "by the Intestate Laws of this State," and, by implication, excludes inheritances under the laws of other States.

The tax imposed upon inheritances and successions is a tax, not upon the property itself, but upon the devolution of, or succession to, the property.

The Statute provides that to make a succession taxable such succession must have occurred or been effected in one of three ways, to wit:

statute or its language which shows a different legislative intent. Ibid.; People v. Tax Comrs. 28 N. Y. 224; People v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 576.

So bonds of foreign corporations in the hands of the agents were, by the general policy of the State, exempted from taxation here. Re Knston's Will, supra; 1 Rev. Stat. 839, § 5, as amended by Laws 1861, chap. 176, § 2, chap. 419, § 3; Williams v. Wayne County Supra. 78 N. Y. 561.

Constitutionality of laws imposing a collateral inheritance tax.

The Laws of 1885, imposing a collateral inheritance tax, are not unconstitutional, because failing to state the object to which it is to be applied or provide for notice to parties. Re McPherson, 6 Cent. Rep. 781, 104 N. Y. 306.

A tax on gifts, legacies and collateral inheritances, which operates alike on all property and persons similarly situated, and which is made by a judicial officer, after notice and opportunity to be heard, does not conflict with the provisions of U. S. Const., 14th Amend. Wallace v. Myers, 4 L. R. A. 171, 38 Fed. Rep. 184.

A tax on property acquired by inheritance is not unconstitutional as to United States bonds included in the property of the decedent. Ibid. See note to Howe's Estate (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 826.

Succession and collateral inheritance taxes under the New York statutes.

No tax was imposed upon property passing by will or intestacy from a nonresident of New York by the Collateral-Inheritance Tax Act of 1885. People v. Sherwood, 3 L. R. A. 464, and note, 113 N. Y. 174; Re Tulane, 51 Hun, 218. And compare Re Leavitt, 22 N. Y. S. R. 81.

The Act of 1885 provided for the imposition of taxes upon bequests to collateral relatives and strangers, and this tax can be imposed only when the particular interests bequeathed exceed in value the amount of the limitation provided by the Statute. Re Cager, 111 N. Y. 343, affirming 46 Hun, 657; Re Hopkins, 6 Dem. 1; Re McCready, Id. 228; Re Smith, 5 Dem. 90; McVean v. Sheldon, 48 Hun, 163. Compare Re Miller, 5 Dem. 132.

It was the intention of the Legislature to amend, and not to repeal, the Act of 1885, by the passage of the Act of 1897. Re Arnett, 49 Hun, 599.

It was not so far abrogated by the Amendment of 1897 as to relieve estates from liability for tax which accrued under the former Act and were not collected before the passage of the latter. Ibid.

The Act of 1897 is not retroactive so as to govern in the assessment and collection of a tax on interests passing under the will of the decedent dying before it took effect. Re Brooks, 6 Dem. 165; Re Miller, 110 N. Y. 216, 47 Hun, 394, 6 Dem. 119; Ryan's Estate, 18 N. Y. S. R. 922; Hendrick's Estate, 1 Connolly, 301. Compare Kissam v. People, 6 Dem. 171.

But the real and personal property of a nonresident dying subsequent to the passage of the Act of 1897 is subject to the tax. Re Vinot's Estate, 7 N. Y. Supp. 517.

As to the time intervening between the passage of the Act of 1885 and the passage of the Act of 1897 for cases arising in the intervening period, the earlier Statute continues as if the later had not been enacted. Warriner v. People, 6 Dem. 211; Re Thompson, 14 N. Y. S. R. 497. Compare Re Chardavoyne, 5 Dem. 460.

Hence, where a testator died at a time intervening the passage of the two Acts, the right of the State being fixed and vested, it remained unaffected by the later Act, which exempted adopted children from the "collateral inheritance tax." Warriner v. People, Re Thompson and Ryan's Estate, supra.

either (1) by will; or, (2) by the Intestate Laws of this State; or, (3) by deed, grant, etc., to take effect on death.

It follows that a succession occurring or effectuated by neither of these agencies is not within the operation of the Statute.

Orcutt's App. 97 Pa. 179; Re Tulane, supra.

In the construction of laws imposing taxes, it is always presumed that the Legislature has so shaped the law as, without ambiguity or doubt, to bring in everything it was meant should be embraced; and where ambiguity is found, the construction must be against the taxing power.

Cooley, Tarn. 2d ed. 267, 275; Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472; Wallace v. Atty-Gen. L. R. 1 Ch. App. 9.

Though the power of Parliament to tax the succession of foreigners to personal property in England is undoubted, yet no such intention would be presumed.

Wallace v. Atty-Gen. supra.

Residence or nonresidence of the decedent has nothing to do with the question of the thing sought to be taxed. It is immaterial whether the decedent was a resident or non-resident—whether the property was of one kind or another (Re Howard, supra); provided only that in the case of intestacy, the devolution should be by the laws of this State, and the property be "within this State."

Re McPherson, supra.

It cannot be presumed that it was the intention of the Legislature to impose taxation upon all the property of any and every decedent found within this State.

Re Enston's Will, 3 L. R. A. 464, 113 N. Y. 174.

The succession in this case was not by the Intestate Laws of this State, but by the laws of Virginia.

The property in question never was "within this State," within the meaning of the Statute. Being temporarily here for safe keeping, its situs was that of the intestate's domicile.

Mr. Benjamin F. Dos Passos, with Mr. De Lancey Nicoll, Dist. Atty., for respondent:

The property of decedent being, at the time of his death, actually within this State, and passing to his nephews and niece, became liable under chapter 718 of the Laws of 1887, to taxation, irrespective of the fact that his domicile was in Virginia and he died there intestate.

Under the Act of 1885 it was held that estates of nonresident testators within this State were not liable to taxation; that there was no intention disclosed in the Act to tax such estates.

Re Enston's Will, 3 L. R. A. 464, 113 N. Y. 174.

Prior to this it was held by the general term that estates of nonresident intestates were likewise not liable.

A bequest of a specified sum to testatrix's executors, in trust, "to expend the same for masses for the repose of the said husband and myself," and naming the person whom testatrix desired should celebrate the masses, is subject to the collateral inheritance tax. Black's Estate, 1 Connolly, 477.

No portion of an inheritance or testamentary gift amounting to $500 or more is exempt from the tax imposed by N. Y. The fiction has only been held applicable by the English courts, under the Legacy Act, upon the express ground that there was no intention on the part of Parliament to tax nonresident decedents. All the cases which exempt the personal property of nonresidents actually within the taxing State at the time of death will be found upon examination to be distinguishable upon this express ground.

The English decisions as construing the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts, are often irreconcilable, because, while all nonresident decedents are generally exempted under the former Act (*Thompson v. Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is whether succession to the personal property of a nonresident intestate, invested or habitually kept by him in this State, is subject to taxation under the Collateral Inheritance Act. The original Act provided that after the passage thereof "all property which shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while being a resident of the State, or which property shall be within the State," to anyone other than certain excepted persons nearly related to the decedent, should be subject to a tax of $5 upon the hundred "of the clear market value of such property." Laws 1885, chap. 483, § 1. When this Statute came before the courts for construction it was held not to apply to property within this State, either real or personal, that passed by will or intestacy from a nonresident decedent to collateral relatives or strangers; and that it was limited in its effect to property so passing from resident decedents. Re Elnston's Will, 113 N. Y. 174, 5 Dem. 93, 46 Hun, 506, 3 L. R. A. 464; Re Tulane, 51 Hun, 218; Re Clark, 29 N. Y. S. R. 650.

In 1887, however, the Legislature amended the Act, so that it now provides that "all property which shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same, while a resident of this State, or, if such decedent was not a resident of this State at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this State," etc. Laws 1887, chap. 713, § 1. The part inserted by the amendment is italicized for convenience of comparison. What did the Legislature wish to accomplish when it inserted these words? This question is not easily answered, for the section is so involved as to make the duty of discovering its meaning unusually difficult. Shortly after the original Act was passed, litigation arose over its provisions, and the courts ry Act of 1887 a devise or bequest to such children was subject to taxation. Re Miller, 110 N. Y. 216, 47 Hun, 394, 6 Dem. 119.

To entitle an adopted child to exemption from the collateral inheritance tax, under N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 713, § 1, it is sufficient that the proceedings for his adoption conform substantially to the New York statute, where they were had in another State. Re Butler's Estate, 34 N. Y. S. R. 189.

Stepdaughters who lived with testatrix after the death of their father, testatrix looking after their education and addressing and speaking of them as her children, they in turn addressing her as mother, and the same friendly relations continuing after the marriage of such stepdaughters, are not subject to the payment of a collateral inheritance tax on estates devised by the testatrix, as the latter stood in the relation of a parent to them. Re Capron, 30 N. Y. S. R. 948.

A legacy to a niece, who for many years had lived with the testatrix and had been supported by her, in the apparent relation of parent and adopted child, although the parties were never addressed by each other as "mother" and "daughter," but where it is apparent that the niece was treated in all respects as if she had been an adopted child, is exempt from the tax. Re Spencer, 1 Connolly, 308.

In the absence of allegation or proof to the contrary it is presumed that, after making the order affirming the appraisement of the estate, the surrogate gave the notice prescribed by statute of the amount of tax to be paid by the adopted child. Re Miller, supra.

Corporations, associations, etc.; when not exempt.

A charitable or benevolent association which provides for the reception of boarders, who are required to give satisfactory security for the regular payment of their board, is not an almshouse so as to exempt it from the payment of the collateral inheritance tax. Re Keech's Estate, 32 N. Legacies to religious societies and colleges not exempted from taxation by charter or special laws are liable to a collateral inheritance tax under the New York Law of 1887. Catlin v. Trinity College, 3 L. R. A. 206, 113 N. Y. 138.

A legacy to a board of home missions is not exempt from the collateral inheritance tax, under the were called upon to discharge the delicate function of declaring what the confused and conflicting passages meant. The surrogate's court and the supreme court held that the Act, before it was amended, applied to the estates of nonresident decedents; and when the question reached the court of appeals two of its judges were of the same opinion, but a majority thought otherwise, and the construction of the lower courts was overturned. Re Enston's Will, supra.

Although the Amendment of 1887 was probably passed in view of the litigation then pending, and with the intention of removing the doubt caused thereby, candid men are still compelled to hesitate and divide in pronouncing judgment. It must be assumed that the Legislature in passing the amendment intended to make some change, and the expression, "or if such decedent was not a resident of this State at the time of death," suggests what that change was. Before it was amended, the Act, as was subsequently held, applied only to one class of persons,—resident decedents,—but by the amendment it is made applicable to another class—nonresident decedents. But does it apply to all persons belonging to these two classes? It is not denied that it applies to all resident decedents and to all nonresident testators, but it is contended that it does not apply to nonresident intestates, because property "which shall pass . . . by the Intestate Laws of this State" is expressly mentioned, to the implied exclusion of property passing by the Intestate Laws of other States. This is the position of the appellant, whose learned counsel claims that the Act, in its present form, was designed to meet cases of succession by will, but not of succession by intestacy, unless the intestate was a resident of this State. It is difficult, however, to see why the Legislature should discriminate, simply for the purpose of taxation, between the property of a nonresident decedent who made a will and of one who did not. It is not probable that there was an intention to tax the estates of nonresident testators, and to exempt those of nonresident intestates, because there is no foundation for such a distinction. People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, 585. Property of the same kind, situated in the same place, receiving the same protection from the law and administered upon in the same way, would naturally be required to contribute towards the expense of government upon the same basis, regardless of whether its last owner died testate or intestate. The language of the Act, as amended, does not indicate the intention thus contended for when the entire section is read together, because nonresident decedents are mentioned, while nonresident testators are not. Although "the Intestate Laws of this State" are named as a source

A benefit association incorporated under the Act of 1843, chap. 319, for the relief of the aged and disabled and of the families of deceased officers and clerks of New York banks and savings banks, which provided for assessments to be paid to entitle to membership, and having no provision in its charter exempting it from taxation, is subject to the tax. Re Jones, 1 Connolly, 125.

Assessment of tax.

The right of the wife to whom an estate is devised for life to impair and diminish the same for any purpose whatever renders the assessment of a collateral inheritance tax, under N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 483, premature during her life. Re Cayuga County Surrogate, 46 Hun, 657.

The original testator left certain property to his wife for life, and after her death part of it to his son, his heirs or assigns. The son died intestate during the life estate and his son inherited, but he also died. It was held that the parties to whom he left the property took a vested remainder or fee, with the right to enjoy the same upon the death of the life tenant, and the tax can be fixed and assessed on the legacy. Van Beneselaer's Estate, N. Y. L. J. May 25, 1889.

Authority and power of surrogate.

The surrogate is deemed the superior authority upon all questions, including that of value of the estate subject to the tax. Re Astor, 6 Dem. 402.

He will not take any steps, upon his own motion, until the expiration of eighteen months after the decedent's death. Ibid.

Application for appraisement.

It is the duty of an executor to apply for an appraisement of interests passing by the will of his decedent taxable under the Collateral Inheritance Tax Act. The power given to the surrogate of his own motion to cause an appraisement to be made, and to fix the tax, was not intended to relieve personal representatives of this obligation. Frazer v. 12 L. R. A.

People, 6 Dem. 174; Re Frowe, 20 N. Y. S. R. 355. Compare Re Farley, 15 N. Y. S. R. 727; Re Astor, 6 Dem. 413.

In the case of a contingent interest, and upon the happening of a contingency upon which it should take effect, an appraisement of such interest should be had. Wallace's Estate, 18 N. Y. S. R. 387.

Appraiser, appointment and duty of.

The order appointing an appraiser will designate the person upon whom service of notice by mail shall be made, including all interested in the estate. Re Astor, 6 Dem. 402.

The appointment of an appraiser is not necessary where the legacies subject to the tax are in cash. Ibid.; Re Jones, 19 Abb. N. C. 221, 5 Dem. 30.

He should be appointed only where specific legacies subject to the tax under that Act are given, or where taxable inheritances exist, or estates in fee are devised, or remainders, annuities, life estates or terms of years are created. Re Jones, supra.

It is the duty of the appraisers to appraise only the estates of the persons whose estates are inherited or created by will, and which are subject to the tax. Re Robertson, 5 Dem. 92.

Even if the property of the decedent is situated in more than one county, the appraiser appointed may appraise it all. Keenan's Estate, 1 Connolly, 225.

Valuation.

In appraisals, the value of the life estate is to be ascertained by reference to the tables of mortality adopted by the general rules of practice. Re Robertson, 5 Dem. 92.

Though it may be necessary to deplete the principal fund to pay life annuities, and be impossible to determine their cash value, the property should be taken at its market value at testator's death. Re Leavitt, 22 N. Y. S. R. 81.

Where the beneficiary of a devise is known, the property definite and the event to occur certain the present value of devisee's interest can be fixed. Higgins' Estate, N. Y. L. J. 1890.

Where the valuation of the estate of the remain-of title, they are not the exclusive source, and neither necessarily nor naturally apply to the property of nonresident decedents named at a later point in the section. In this discussion it is assumed, as the appellant claims, that the personal property of such persons passes according to the laws of the State where they reside.

By comparing the original with the amended Act, and analyzing the provisions of the latter in the light thus afforded, we think that the Legislature intended by the fore part of the sentence under consideration to provide for succession to the estates of residents to which "the Intestate Laws of this State" apply; that after providing for that class a change is made, indicated by the use of the disjunctive particle "or," which suggests a transition to another subject, and introduces another class,—nonresidents,—who are also provided for; and then each class is carried forward to the taxing clause, which embraces both. As thus construed, "the Intestate Laws of this State" have no application to the second class, being separated from it by the word "or," and confined to that clause of the sentence in which they occur. They are not repeated in the second clause, either literally or by implication, although the words "all property," in the first clause, are repeated in the second in the form of "which property," but no limitation is there applied to them. "Which property," as thus used, means the property of the nonresident decedent, and such property, if personal, would not pass by the Intestate Laws of this State. This construction is confirmed by referring to other portions of the Act, which provide that "all administrators, executors and trustees" shall be liable for the taxes until paid (§ 1); and that, "whenever any foreign executor or administrator shall assign or transfer any stocks or loans in this State, standing in the name of a decedent," the tax shall be paid to the proper officer on such transfer, or the corporation permitting it shall become liable to pay the tax, provided it had knowledge of the facts in time. Section 2. It is clear that the Act is not confined to real estate, but embraces personal property also, including evidences of debt. All administrators are made liable for the tax; and corporations can trapster stock standing upon their books in the name of a nonresident decedent only at their peril, until the tax thereon is paid. The fiction of law that personal estate has no situs away from the person or residence of its owner is done away with to a limited extent, and for a specified purpose, and the truth is substituted in its stead as the rule of action. That the Legislature had the power to do this can hardly be questioned. Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 806, 6 Cent. Rep. 781. As was said by Judge Story, when writing upon this subject: "A nation within whose territory any personal derman cannot be determined because the whole estate may be absorbed during the lifetime of the life tenant, the appraisal cannot be had until the death of the life tenant. Fleming's Estate, N. Y. L. J. Oct. 15, 1889.

Where a contingency rendered the present appraisable value incapable of any approximate valuation owing to certain executory devises there is no basis for imposition of the tax. Re Cager, 111 N. Y. 343, 46 Hun. 697.

Report of appraiser.

The appraiser should report all property as to which he is in doubt, as subject to the tax. Hendricks' Estate, 18 N. Y. S. R. 969.

The great age of a life tenant whose share is subject to the tax is no reason for postponing the confirmation of the report of the appraiser. Wilkes' Estate, N. Y. L. J. Oct. 31, 1889.

An appraiser should only report upon property subject at the time to the tax prescribed by the law, and not upon a contingent interest. Wallace's Estate, 18 N. Y. S. R. 387.

The appraiser should report the market value of a contingent interest at the date of the decedent's death and leave the taxation for future action. Clark's Estate, 1 Connolly, 434.

A gift to an infant being of a watch and chain and diamond studs not within the exempted class, to be given to him when he reached the age of twenty-one, and the income of $15,000 till he reached that age, and at that age the sum of $10,000 outright and the unexpended income, and in case of his death before that age, the whole bequest to become part of the residuary estate, the appraiser should report the present value of the income of the whole bequest of $15,000. Mathews' Estate, N. Y. L. J. 1889.

Payment of tax.

The tax on a pecuniary legacy accrues on the death of the testator, though it is not payable until the legatee becomes entitled to the benefit of the legacy. Hellman v. United States, 15 Blatchf. 15.

The tax is payable if the property is constructive-

Where an estate chargeable under this Act cannot be settled at the end of one year from the death of the decedent by reason of claims made upon it, by necessary litigation, or other unavoidable cause of delay, only 6 per cent per annum is to be charged upon the tax from the expiration of the year, until the cause of such delay be removed. People v. Prout, 53 Hun, 541.

Enforcement of payment.

Execution must first issue to all persons interested who are liable to the tax before application can be made for its collection. Re Prout, 19 N. Y. S. R. 318.

As to the administrators, executors and trustees, application for the order directing them to pay the tax can be made to the surrogate's court without leave. Ibid.

The surrogate can, on the return of an execution issued upon his decree, enforce the decree by proceedings for contempt under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 2555. Ibid. See note to Howe's Estate (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 825, for the law of other States.

property is actually situated has an entire dominion over it while therein, in point of sovereignty and jurisdiction, as it has over immovable property situated there." Conf. L. § 550. In People v. Tax Comrs., 23 N. Y. 224, 228, Judge Comstock quotes with approval the foregoing extract, and adds: "I can think of no more just and appropriate exercise of the sovereignty of a State or nation over property situated within it and protected by its laws than to compel it to contribute towards the maintenance of government and law. Accordingly there seems to be no place for the fiction of which we are speaking (mobilia personam sequuntur) in a well-adjusted system of taxation." See also Guillander v. Howell, 35 N. Y. 657; Graham v. First Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 393, 401; Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152; Dos P. Col. Inheritance Taxes, 37, 92.

Orcutt's App., 97 Pa. 179, is pressed upon our attention as opposed to the views here expressed, but that case was decided under a statute differing materially from the one under consideration. 1 Purdon, Dig. 259. The main point of contention there was whether United States bonds, no matter where deposited, had a situs different from the domicile of their owner; and it was held that they had not, by the Act then under review, which was declared "to embrace only personal property of a tangible nature, actually situated or used for business purposes within the Commonwealth, and not to mere certificates of indebtedness, such as government bonds." It was held otherwise by the Court of Appeals of Maryland in State v. Dairymple, 70 Md. 394, 3 L. R. A. 392, where the words "being in this State" were declared to refer to the actual, and not to the constructive, situation of the property. In Albany v. Powell, 2 Jones, Eq. 51, it was held that property, whether real or personal, situate in the State of North Carolina, but belonging to one domiciled and dying intestate in Canada, was subject to the succession tax imposed by a statute of said State. When Re Euston's Will, supra, was before this court the Amendment of 1887 had been passed; but it did not apply to the facts of that case, because they arose before its passage, although the decision was made afterwards. Still the amendment was considered in the prevailing opinion, which stated (113 N. Y. 183) that "by chapter 713 of the Laws of 1887 section 1 of the Act of 1885 was so amended as to subject to its operation the property within this State of a nonresident decedent; and this amendment furnishes some evidence that prior thereto the proper construction of the section, according to the understanding of the Legislature, did not include within its operation such property." In the dissenting opinion reference was made to the same subject in this way (113 N. Y. 184): "Under either Statute [the original and the amendment] the clear intention was to bring in for taxation all property, real and personal, without regard to residence, which was within the jurisdiction of the courts of this State, and to be administered under its laws for the beneficiaries named in the Act, subject only to the exceptions named in the Act itself." All of the property in question has been administered upon in this State alone. There appeared to be no difference in the minds of the six judges who took part in the decision as to the effect of the Amendment of 1887. Apparently they were all of the opinion, as the most of those participating in this decision are, that by the change then made the Act applied to the property within this State of any nonresident decedent. The appellant further contends that the property in question was not "within this State," according to the true meaning of the Statute; and the contention is supported by the argument that it would be unreasonable to tax the money found upon the person of a nonresident who died while traveling in this State. We should hesitate before applying the Statute to any property casually brought into the State for a temporary purpose, as by a visitor or traveler; but the record before us does not present such a case. It might well be held that such property, although literally "within this State," was not here in the sense meant by the Statute, on account of the transitory and accidental character of its presence, and the immediate custody of the owner. Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 476.

Where, however, the money of a nonresident is invested in this State, as it was by Mr. Romaine in the bond and mortgage in question, and in the deposits made by him in the savings banks, or where the property of a nonresident is habitually kept, even for safety, in this State, we think that the Statute applies both in letter and spirit. Such property is within this State in every reasonable sense, receives the protection of its laws, and has every advantage from government, for the support of which taxes are laid, that it would have if it belonged to a resident. We think that a fair construction of the Act permits no distinction as to such property, based simply upon the residence of the deceased owner. We have nothing to do with the policy of the Statute, as our duty is discharged when we declare its meaning, and apply it to the case in hand. That duty we discharge in this instance by adjudging that succession to the personal property in question, lately belonging to Worthington Romaine, a nonresident intestate, but invested or habitually kept by him in this State, is taxable under the Collateral Inheritance Act, in so far as it passed to persons not excepted from its provisions.

Haight, J., dissenting:

The question is as to whether the next of kin of a nonresident decedent intestate are liable to pay a collateral inheritance tax on the personal property of such decedent found within this State. The Statute provides that "after the passage of this Act all property which shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this State, or, if such decedent was not a resident of this State at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this State, . . . shall be and is subject to a tax of $5 on every hundred dollars of the clear market value of such property," etc. Chapter 713, Laws 1887. The taxes imposed by this Act are special, and not general; and the rule is that special tax laws are to be strictly construed against the government and favorably to the taxpayer; that a citizen cannot be subjected to special burdens without clear warrant of law. Re McPherson, 104 N. Y. 306-317, 6 Cent. Rep. 781; Dos P. Col. Inheritance Taxes, 41.

In Re Enston's Will, 118 N. Y. 174-177, 8 L. R. A. 464, Andrews, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The tax imposed by this Act is not a common burden upon all the property or upon the people within the State. It is not a general, but a special, tax, reaching only to special cases, and affecting only a special class of persons. . . . In such a case they [the executors] have the right, both in reason and in justice, to claim that they shall be clearly brought within the terms of the law before they shall be subjected to its burdens. It is a well-established rule that a citizen cannot be subjected to special burdens without clear warrant of law." With this rule in view, operating as our guide, let us review the Statute: "All property which shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while a resident of this State." Here we have clearly expressed the legislative intent to subject to the tax both real and personal property of a resident which shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State. The condition upon which the tax may be imposed is that the property shall pass by will or by the Intestate Laws of the State. "Or, if such decedent was not a resident of this State at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this State." As we have seen, the former clause of the Statute quoted refers to the residents of the State, and the latter clause to nonresidents. The two clauses are connected by the word "or." But we do not understand that by the use of this word it was intended to provide for the taxing of other property than that mentioned in the former clause, but only to provide for the taxing of such property of a nonresident decedent which shall be within this State at the time of his death; and this intention is made apparent from the use in the latter clause of the words "which property," thereby referring to the property which should pass by will or the Intestate Laws of this State. If we are correct in this interpretation of the Statute, it follows that the tax in question was improperly imposed, for the reason that the property of the decedent found in this State was personal; and, the situs being with the owner, it would not pass by the Intestate Laws of this State. Redf. Surr. 2d ed. 588. Chapter 483 of the Laws of 1885 was amended by the Act in question by the insertion of the words, "if such decedent was not a resident of this State at the time of death." Under the former Act it was held that the tax could be imposed only upon property so passing by will or by the Intestate Laws of this State, etc. Re Enston's Will, supra. It is not contended that it was the intention in amending the former Act to bring in nonresident decedents, and subject their estates to the same burdens as residents. This was doubtless the intention as to the real estate, but as to the personal estate we cannot assume that it was the intention to impose a greater or heavier burden upon nonresidents than that which was imposed upon residents. Under the Act of 1885 the tax could not be imposed upon the real estate within this State of a nonresident. Such real estate is subject to the jurisdiction of our State, and would pass under its laws; and under the amended provision of the Act of 1887 it would clearly be assessable here, and could not be elsewhere. But it is quite different with the personal property of a nonresident. As we have already stated, the situs of such property is with the owner, and upon his death it is distributed according to the law of his domicile, and does not pass under our Intestate Laws. Redf. Surr. supra. In many of the States similar laws to the one in question have been enacted. So that, if the personal property of a nonresident decedent should be assessed in this State, and the tax imposed upon the next of kin, it would subject them to the payment of a double tax, for after the transmission of the property to the State of the domicile it would pass under the laws of that State, and they would be liable to the payment of a similar tax in that State. And the same would be true of a decedent in this State who should die having personal property in another State. After being taxed in that State, and the property transmitted to this State, it would pass under our laws, and would consequently, under the provisions of the Act, be clearly liable to the assessment of a collateral inheritance tax. Again referring to the Statute, all property which shall pass by will or the Intestate Laws of this State shall be subject to the tax. In determining the question whether the property is subject to the tax the test is, Does it pass in the manner provided by the Statute? As we have seen, the property in question does not pass by will, or under any of the laws of our State. The order should be reversed, and the proceedings dismissed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

J. W. BURBAGE and Wife

v.

Samuel WINDLEY et al., Exrs., etc., of
R. C. Windley, Deceased, Appts.

(....N. C....)

A promise in consideration of permission to insure the life of a person to pay his wife a sum of money after his death is on a void consideration where the promisor has no insurable interest in the life on which the insurance is taken, and therefore cannot be enforced.

(February 16, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County in NOTE.—Insurance; wager policy void.

A policy taken upon the life of another for speculative purposes is regarded as nothing more than a wager. Amick v. Butler, 9 West. Rep. 843, '11 12 L. R. A.

Ind. 578. See Ruse v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516; Brookway v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 9 Fed. Rep. 249; Bliss, L. Ins. § 9.

The insurable interest must be of a substantial favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover money alleged to be due the wife under a contract. Action dismissed.

Statement by Merrimon, Ch. J.:

The complaint alleges, in substance, that in the year 1888, R. C. Windley, now deceased, the testator of the defendants, at different times specified, applied to three several insurance companies, and obtained from each of them an insurance policy, granted and made payable to him and for his own benefit, whereby each, for the consideration specified therein, insured the life of John W. Hammond, "on the ordinary life plan," for the sum of money in each specified, the three policies aggregating the sum of $10,000. It is not alleged, nor does it at all appear, that the said testator had any insurable or any interest in the life of the said Hammond. It is alleged: "Third. That the consideration, and the only consideration, which induced and moved the said John W. Hammond to permit Mr. Windley to have his life insured, was that the said Windley contracted and agreed with the said John W. Hammond and his wife, Sarah E. Hammond, that out of the moneys which the said Windley would collect on these policies and certificates of insurance upon the life of the said Hammond, after his (the said Hammond's) death, he (Windley) would pay to Sarah E. Hammond (now Burbage) the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars." The said Hammond died on the 15th day of January, 1884, leaving surviving him his said wife, who afterwards, on the 6th day of February, 1884, intermarried with her co-plaintiff. The said insurance companies afterwards, in the month of April, 1884, "took up the policies and certificates of insurance" from the said testator. The plaintiffs made demand of the said testator in his lifetime that he pay to the feme plaintiff, who was widow of the said Hammond, the said sum of $500, which he refused to do. The said R. C. Windley afterwards, on the 15th of December, 1886, died, leaving a last will and testament, which was proven, and the defendants qualified as executors thereof. The plaintiffs bring this action to recover the said sum of $500. The defendants, in their answer, deny the material allegations of the complaint; allege that said contracts of insurance were without consideration and void, as wagering contracts, and against the policy of the law; and pleaded the Statute of Limitation. On the trial there were several exceptions of the defendants to evidence received; others to instructions given to the jury; and others upon the ground that the court refused to give certain instructions specially asked for by them. It is not necessary to report these, as this court disposed of the case on another and a different, distinct ground. In this court the defendants moved to dismiss the action upon the ground that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Messrs. W. J. Rodman, Jr., and John H. Small, for appellants:

No consideration is alleged for Windley's promise. It is required that every promise, not under seal, must be based upon a sufficient consideration.

This consideration forming a material part of the contract must be set forth in the declaration, or else it is bad as not setting forth a cause of action.

Burnet v. Biaco, 4 Johns. 285; Symmons v. Knor, 3 T. R. 87; Pittman v. Pittman, 11 L. R. A. 456, 107 N. C. 159.

The consideration necessary to support a promise must be a valuable one, and while the courts will not inquire into the sufficiency of the consideration, yet it must be something of value.

Haslam v. Sherwood, 10 Bing. 540; Solly v. Hinde, 6 Car. & P. 816.

The consideration must also be one which is not immoral or unlawful, for an unlawful consideration will not support a contract.

This consideration must flow from the plaintiff to the defendant, or from someone at the instance of plaintiff.

Morehead v. Whiston, 78 N. C. 398; Peacock v. Williams, 98 N. C. 824.

If the consent of Hammond was, in law, any consideration, then it amounted to an agreement on Hammond's part to permit Windley to do an act which is contra bonos mores (that is, to take a wagering policy on Hammond's life), and the consideration being an agreement to do, or permit to be done, an unlawful act, fails, and the agreement is nudum pactum.

Covington v. Threadgill, 88 N. C. 186.

The complaint upon its face shows that the policy of insurance, as between Windley and the company, was a wagering one. This being true, a contract between Windley and Hammond, that Windley should take out such a policy on the life of Hammond and divide the character, and such as, under all the circumstances, to take from the transaction all suspicion of wagering. Amick v. Butler, supra; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luoba, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800; Corson's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 307, 113 Pa. 438.

Where a third party, without any insurable interest in the life of another, procures a policy of insurance on the life of such person, either by having a policy issued directly to himself, or by having the person whose life is insured take out a policy to himself and then assign it, the transaction is a mere speculation on the life of another, and, as such, contrary to public policy and void. Lamont v. Grand Lodge Iowa L. of H. 81 Fed. Rep. 180; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 824. See Seigrist v. Schmaltz, 5 Cent. Rep. 230, 113 Pa. 336; Downey v. Hoffer, 16 W. N. C. 185.

A life insurance policy for $3,000 as security for a $100 debt is a wager. Cooper v. Shaeffer (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 601; Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74; Corson's App. supra; Grant v. Kline, 7 Cent. Rep. 628, 115 Pa. 618.

The essential point is that the transaction be bona fide, and not a device to evade the law. Amick v. Butler, 9 West. Rep. 843, 111 Ind. 573, citing *Provident L. Ins. & Inv. Co. v. Merrimon, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this and like actions, where the contract or promise sued upon is by parol, a sufficient consideration should be alleged in the complaint to support the contract or promise. This is essential, because otherwise no cause of action is alleged or appears in the pleadings. In some cases, such as where the cause of action is a bill of exchange or a promissory note and some other legal liabilities, the mere statement of the liability which constitutes the consideration is sufficient. In these cases the nature of the liability itself sued upon implies the consideration; but, in all other cases of simple contract, it is necessary that the complaint should disclose a sufficient, valuable consideration, whatever that may be. Moreover, the consideration alleged must be lawful, and not in its nature, because of some tainting or vitiating quality in it, void. Moore v. Hobbs, 79 N. C. 585; Burnet v. Bisco, 4 Johns. 235; 1 Chitty, Pl. 294. There are cases where a cause of action is imperfectly alleged in the complaint. This pleading may be helped by admissions in the answer, but this is not one of them. Indeed, there is no admission in the answer that, in any view of the allegations of the complaint, would help them at all. Hence it appears from the complaint itself—the allegations of the supposed cause of action—that the only consideration alleged or relied upon is, as we shall presently see, unlawful and void as such. In other words, it appears from the complaint that there is no consideration to support the promise to pay the sum of money for which the plaintiffs demand judgment. The complaint itself discloses the material facts that R. C. Windley, the testator of the defendants, in his lifetime, procured three policies of insurance, each purporting to insure the life of John W. Hammond, the former husband of the feme plaintiff, for a sum of money specified therein, the three sums aggregating $10,000; Windley, in consideration of permission given him by Hammond to so insure the latter's life, agreeing to pay, of the money he might realize from such insurance, $500 to the feme plaintiff. It is not alleged that Windley had any insurable interest in the life of Hammond. On the contrary, it appears by implication, if this is not expressly alleged, that he had none. It is alleged "that the consideration, and the only consideration, which induced and moved the said John W. Hammond to permit Mr. Windley to have his life insured, was that the said Windley contracted and agreed with said John W. Hammond and his wife, Sarah E. Hammond, that out of the moneys which the said Windley would collect on these policies and certificates of insurance upon the life of the said Hammond, after his (the said Hammond's) death, he (Windley) would pay to Sarah E. 12 L. R. A.

Hammond, (now Burbage), the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars." It thus clearly appears that the purpose of Windley, with the knowledge, consent and co-operation of Hammond, was to insure the latter's life, in which he had no insurable interest, for his own benefit. He simply promised to pay the feme plaintiff, of the money he might realize after the death of her husband, $500, expecting to realize $9,500 for himself, less such premiums on the insurance as he might pay. As the assured had no insurable interest in the life of the cestui que vie, the contract of insurance was simply a wager; it was not founded upon any just or lawful consideration; it was a mere gambling speculation. The assured was not to be indemnified against loss, injury or disadvantage in any respect growing out of the life he insured; the insurance was not intended to serve any legitimate business purpose or end; it was purely a matter of speculation, founded upon nothing but hazard. Such contracts and speculations are wholly unnecessary. They cannot serve or promote any useful and wholesome purposes of individuals, society or government. They do not stimulate, promote or encourage industry, enterprise, legitimate business, sound morality or increase the wealth of the people, or the strength and power of the State. On the contrary, their nature and uniform experience go to show that they represent nothing substantial or valuable, or of practical advantage to persons or communities. They strongly tend to demoralize society, and embarrass industries and general business. In their very nature, they stimulate, afford incentives to and encourage those who become parties to them, to resort to sinister, oftentimes criminal, means to turn or end the hazard in their favor, and thus gain unjust and dishonest advantage. They encourage men to engage in the business of speculation in hazards, not necessary or useful in the general purposes and businesses of life, but which is positively and seriously injurious to them. Such contracts and speculations contravene the justice and policy of the law,—they are contra bonos mores, and are therefore void. While there is no decision of this court directly in point here, it is well settled, by a multitude of uniform decisions, that all contracts against the policy of the law, and such as contravene sound morality, are on such account void. We cite a few of many cases: Sharp v. Farmer, 4 Dev. & B. L. 123; Blythe v. Lovinggood, 2 Ired. L. 20; Ingram v. Ingram, 4 Jones, L. 188; King v. Winants, 71 N. C. 469; Williams v. Carr, 80 N. C. 295; Grieffin v. Hasty, 94 N. C. 488.

In Shepherd v. Sawyer, 2 Murph. 26, the court held that when "A agreed with B, for 2½ per cent premium paid down, to insure a negro slave reported to be lost in Pasquotank River, B had no interest in the negro; yet, his loss being proved, B is entitled to recover his value." This decision is placed upon the ground that it was an "innocent wager," and that such wagers were sanctioned by the common law. The opinion of the court is very brief, and no authority is cited to show that it was "innocent," nor is any reason stated why it was such a wager. If the court intended that the case should have general application to wagers in insurance, embracing cases like the present one, we cannot hesitate to say, in the absence of reasons stated in support of it, that, in our judgment, it is not sustained by the greater weight of reason, or the greater weight of authority certainly at the present day. Ruse v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. 516; Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115; Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Hazard, 41 Ind. 116; Cammack v. Lewis, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 648, 21 L. ed. 244; Atina L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. ed. 287; Warlock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924; Bliss, Ins. § 9.

The consideration of the contract or promise sued upon here, as expressly alleged, was the permission granted to the testator of the defendant by the former husband of the feme plaintiff, Hammond, to insure the latter's life. If such permission, in any case or connection, could be a valuable privilege or advantage, in this case it was granted with the view and for the purpose of enabling and helping Windley to make an unlawful contract—a wager—on the life of Hammond. Thus the latter became connected with and intended to share in the wagering transaction. The promise to pay $500 to the feme plaintiff was expressly based upon and grew out of it; it was, as to Hammond and his wife, part of it. It partook of the wager,—the vicious nature of the contract of insurance. Such consideration was therefore void. Hence the promise founded upon it was without legal sanction, and of no binding effect, in contemplation of law. Ex terpi causa non oritur actio. Duke v. Asbee, 11 Ired. L. 112; Bettis v. Reynolds, 12 Ired. L. 844; Covington v. Threadgill, 88 N. C. 186; Griffin v. Hasty, 94 N. C. 438.

If, in good faith, the purpose had been to insure the life of Hammond for the benefit of his wife, the case, as to her, might be very different. But, as we have seen, this was not the purpose, or any part of it. The insurance was for the benefit of Windley; the policies were granted to and made payable to him; he promised to pay the small sum mentioned to the feme plaintiff for permission to insure the life.

As therefore it appears from the complaint that no cause of action is alleged, the motion to dismiss the action must be allowed.

One who furnishes drinks to members of a club as tenants in common, from intoxicating liquors which they have given him to hold for them on payment to him of the cost price, which he uses to replenish the stock, makes a sale of intoxicating liquors within the meaning of a statute requiring a license for such sales.

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Buncombe County in favor of defendant, who was indicted for selling spirituous liquors without a license. Reversed.

Statement by Clark, J.:

Indictment for retailing spirituous liquors without license, tried before Moore, J., at January Term, 1891, of Buncombe Criminal Court. The jury returned a special verdict, the 19th paragraph of which is as follows: "That on April 26, 1890, the defendant, at the club house of the Cosmopolitan Club, in the City of Asheville, furnished and dealt out to the said W. E. Williamson, a small quantity, to wit, a drink, of spirituous liquor, so held by the defendant as aforesaid, the said drink being a quantity less than a quart, and being taken by said defendant from a demijohn in which some other members as aforesaid had an equal quantity of liquor with said Williamson; and at the same time and place received from said Williamson the sum of ten cents, in the legal currency of the United States, which sum was about the value of the quantity of said spirituous liquor so furnished as aforesaid; and that said defendant thereupon handed the said sum of money to the said E. J. Holmes, who afterwards expended it for the purchase of other spirituous liquors for the said Williamson, and turned the same over to the custody of the defendant for the replenishment of the stock of liquor of said Williamson." The other facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Upon the special verdict the court held that the defendant was not guilty, and ordered his discharge. Appeal by the State.

Mr. J. B. Batchelor for appellant.
Mr. F. H. Busbee for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The transaction presented by the special verdict, stripped of surplusage, is this: The defendant was steward of the Cosmopolitan Club of Asheville, and was indicted for selling spirituous liquor to its members. In consequence of the decision in the analogous case of State v. Lockyear, 95 N. C. 633 (the state of facts being the same), he pleaded guilty. The club thereupon distributed a part of the liquors on is a common nuisance, under Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 206. Com. v. Baker (Mass.) Oct. 4, 1890.

To convict under an indictment for maintaining such a nuisance, it is not necessary to show that the sole purpose of the club was to sell and distribute liquors to its members or others, it being sufficient if that was one of the purposes for which it was kept. Com. v. Jacobs (Mass.) Oct. 23, 1890.

Montana.

A social club is not subject to a license tax, by reason of keeping a bar and furnishing liquors to hand to certain of its members, who placed them in the hands of the defendant to be held by him not for the club as a club, but for those individual members of the club as tenants in common, the shares of each not being kept separate, but mingled in the same casks, jars and demijohns. From time to time, as each of those members wished, he obtained drinks from the defendant for himself and friends, paying therefor (in money, or giving tickets afterwards redeemed in money), as near as may be, the cost price of the drinks so furnished, and with the money the defendant from time to time replenished the stock of liquors. We can see in this transaction no substantial distinction from the facts of Lockyear's Case. There the steward of the club, as a club, received the money for drinks furnished at cost, and with the money replenished the stock of liquors. Here the individuals of the club, treating themselves as unorganized, furnished through defendant to themselves, from a common stock, the drinks at cost, and with the money received therefor replenished the common stock. When in the present case an individual received drinks for himself and friends, he clearly did not receive the identical liquor which belonged to himself, but he received liquor which belonged mostly to others, and in which he had a minute undivided interest. For his money he received in exchange liquor which belonged to several others, as well as to himself, and converted it to his sole and separate use. Before the transaction the money was solely his, and the liquor belonged to several. By virtue of the transaction, and in exchange for the money, the liquor became his sole and separate property. This is surely a sale. It has every element of a sale. It cannot affect the transaction that subsequently the defendant would purchase the same amount of liquor in value for the party paying the money, and mingle it in the common stock. This last act is that of a member of an association keeping up his quota of contribution to the common stock; the other is the purchase by a member of an association from its common agent, and the character and purport of the act are not changed by the subsequent contribution. It could make no difference that here the defendant was the agent of the individual members of the club, acting as an unorganized body, and that in Lockyear's Case the salesman was agent of individuals acting as an organized club. If an agent is appointed by several tenants in common to dispose of real or personal property, and he does dispose of any part thereof in exchange for money, it is none the less a sale because the party paying the money and receiving such part to his own use happens to be one of the tenants in common. And it would still be a sale although afterwards the money so received should be invested in the purchase of similar property held by the same tenant in common. The dealing here is simply what is known as "co-operation," which is an arrangement by which a member of an association procures supplies from the association at cost. The object and the effect of co-operation are not to abolish purchases, for the member still buys from the association, but to procure supplies at cost. This transaction is necessarily either a partition in severalty to the tenant in common or a purchase. It is clearly not a partition to each tenant in common in severalty of his undivided portion in the common stock, and it is plain that such are not the purpose and intent of the parties, for money is received in exchange, and it is to be used to obtain more liquor. Besides, the person obtaining the liquor not only does not obtain the identical liquor belonging to him, but he could very rarely, if ever, obtain his exact aliquot part, unless the stock became very low. The fact specially found that the membership of the club is "composed of gentlemen of the highest social standing" does not throw any light upon the transaction, except that it may be reasonably supposed that they have no desire to evade the law, and by this proceeding wish merely to procure a construction as to the legal nature of this transaction. No set of men have any special privileges under our Constitution, and the parties interested must pay a license tax if other citizens pay it, and be prohibited altogether when others are prohibited. Nor can it make any difference that no profit was intended to be realized, but that as near as possible the drinks are to be furnished at cost. Profit is not a necessary ingredient of a sale. Indeed, many sales are made at a loss. Besides, if the defendant's contention was sound, "co-operative bar-rooms" would spring up on all sides, and the Revenue Act as to the sale of liquor, or the Prohibition Laws, where they prevail, would be a nullity. If the gentlemen composing the Cosmopolitan Club of Asheville can be exempted from the license tax by the simple device of treating themselves as unorganized tenants in common of a stock of spirituous liquors, and employing an agent to furnish drinks to any of their club and their friends, by selling at cost, the same can be done by any 500 or 5,000 patrons of a bar-room. The "dealer" would simply become an "agent," and, in lieu of profits, would receive as compensation for his services a commission on purchases or some amount out of receipts, and the money received for drinks would be invested as usual, and, as in the pres-its members and visitors, where they are not sold at a profit and the club is not a device for evading the laws as to the sale of intoxicating liquors. Barden v. Montana Club (Mont.) 11 L. R. A. 598.

New York.

That defendant in a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquors was selling them for a social club to whom they belonged is no defense, where the club is a scheme to evade the laws prohibiting the sale of liquor. People v. Sinell, 34 N. Y. S. R. 898.

ent case, to buy more liquor for the customer and his friends. Such an arrangement may be ingenious, but none the less a license tax is requisite to make it legal to furnish drinks in that mode. The case of State v. Lockyear has been often cited with approval in the courts of other States. State v. Easton Social L. & M. Club, 78 Md. 97, 10 L. R. A. 64, and other cases. 1. A bequest for an "art institute" is not void for indefiniteness, especially when a codicil refers to its distribution in prizes for works "of the fine arts."
2. The phrase "worthy of the city," in a will giving a fund for an art institute when citizens have contributed funds necessary to found one worthy of the city, does not make the gift void for indefiniteness.
3. A bequest is not void for remoteness where it gives a fund for an art institute, to take effect when the necessary funds to found one are contributed, and in the meanwhile directs the income to be distributed annually in prizes for the best works of art by artists belonging to or residing in the State.
4. A bequest is a lawful charity in every respect where it is given for an art institute when established and the income is to be given in the meantime in annual prizes for works of art.

5. A gift of the residue of testator's property to children of a sister and of a deceased brother, to be equally divided, limited by a codicil "to the children of the first generation" gives nothing to the children of a nephew, who died before the will was made, under Pub. Durfee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill is brought by the administrator with will annexed of the will of the late Albert J. Jones for instruction in regard to the execution of the will in points involving its construction. The will bears date May 24, A. D. 1886. The first clause is as follows: "I give and bequeath the sum of twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars as a fund for an art institute in the City of Providence. When the citizens of Providence shall have contributed the funds necessary to found an institute worthy of the city for the promotion of art, then this sum, with accumulated interest, shall be permanently invested, to be called the 'Albert Jones Art Fund,' the annual interest only to be used for the benefit of the institute for all time." The testator added a codicil to the will dated April 25, A. D. 1887. The first clause of the codicil is as follows: "I wish the income of the fund of twenty-five thousand dollars given for the encouragement of art to become at once available after my death by its distribution in annual prizes for the best works produced during the year, in whatever department of the fine arts, by artists belonging to or residing in the State of Rhode Island."

The first question is whether these clauses are valid. It is contended that the bequest in the first clause is void for indefiniteness, it being uncertain what is meant by an "art institute," owing to the indeterminateness of the word "art," and still more uncertain what is meant by an institute for the promotion of art "worthy of the City" of Providence. It is true the word "art" is sometimes used very broadly, as, for instance, when it is used in contradistinction to nature or in the phrase "the arts of war and peace." But it is also used, especially when used without any qualifying adjective or phrase, to signify art in its higher manifestations, or art par excellence, as represented in works of art by those who are distinctively denominated "artists." In this sense the word is used to designate the groups of arts known as the "fine arts," as distinguished from the useful or mechanical and industrial arts. We think the word has this more distinctive meaning in the first clause of the will. The language of the codicil confirms this interpretation. The testator there, describing the $25,000 bequeathed in the first clause as "a fund given for the encouragement of art," declares that he wishes the income "to become at once available," evidently meaning that he wishes it to become available for the purpose for which the fund was given, namely, "the encouragement of art," and to that end directs its distribution in

"Among such Roman Catholic charities, institutions, schools or churches in the City of New York," as a majority of the trustees should select, and in such sums as they should think proper, was held a valid bequest. Power v. Cassidy, 79 N. Y. 602, 35 Am. Rep. 560.

Bequests held void as to uncertainty.

The following bequests were held void for uncertainty: A bequest to a law library which has no corporate existence, but which was established and maintained by fines, etc., to be paid to a committee appointed by the court, is a bequest to a mere inanimate thing having no capacity to receive a gift. Craig v. Lilly (Pa.) 7 Cent. Rep. 669.

To "distribute to such persons, societies or institutions as they shall consider most deserving," was held void. Nichols v. Allen, 180 Mass. 211.

"Among such incorporated societies organized under the Laws of the State of New York or the State of Maryland, having full authority to receive or hold funds upon permanent trusts for charitable or educational uses," as the trustees might select, and in such sums as they should determine, was held void. Prichard v. Thompson, 95 N. Y. 78.

A testator bequeathed a portion of his estate "to the poor of the City of Green Bay." There were no city paupers nor a poor fund in the City of Green Bay at the time of the testator's death. This was held void for uncertainty. Re Hoffman's Estate, 70 Wis. 522.

Also for testator's "next of kin who may be needy." Fontaine v. Thompson, 80 Va. 229.

So, too, "for any and all benevolent purposes" 12 L. R. A.

that he (the trustee) may see fit." Adye v. Smith, 44 Conn. 60.

Where a bequest to charitable purposes in the discretion of the two daughters and granddaughter of the testator is vague and indefinite and therefore void, the fund falls into and constitutes a part of the general residue of the estate. Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 67.

A bequest in trust of a "sum of money sufficient to carry out [testator's] intention . . . to provide for the education of two young men," where the trustees have accepted the trust, and the young men have been appointed, and the expense of keeping them is approximately known, is not void for indefiniteness. Field v. Drew Theological Sem. 41 Fed. Rep. 371.

A clause in the will which seeks to establish a trust in two thirds of the residue of testator's estate, for the benefit of testator's children and their descendants "who may be destitute, and, in the opinion of said trustees, need such aid," is too remote in its contingency, and must be deemed to be invalid and without effect. Kent v. Dunham, 143 Mass. 216, citing Nightingale v. Burrell, 15 Pick. 104; Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142; Sears v. Russell, 8 Gray, 36; Thorndike v. Loring, 15 Gray, 391.

Charitable uses and trusts. See notes to Finley v. Brent (Va.) 11 L. R. A. 214; George v. Braddock (N. J.) 6 L. R. A. 511; State v. Ladies of the Sacred Heart (Mo.) 6 L. R. A. 38; *Bullard v. annual prizes for the best works "of the fine arts" produced during the year by Rhode Island artists. We think there can be no doubt that what is meant by "an art institute" is an institution or establishment, resembling such as exist in Europe, for the promotion of the fine arts,—of the art whose aim is beauty rather than utility, though not necessarily to the exclusion of utility, when the two can be combined. The objection to the phrase "worthy of the city" is, in our opinion, specious, rather than sound. When a testator uses such a phrase, he knows, of course, that, as practically applied, it has different meanings for different minds, but he also knows that the meaning is capable of determination by the court, aided by proper testimony, with sufficient accuracy for the purposes of his bequest, in case it is found necessary to apply to the court for such determination. We do not think the bequest is void for indefiniteness.

The second contention is that the bequest is void for remoteness, because it may not go into final effect within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. A trust for charitable uses, which is to go into effect immediately, is not subject to the rule against perpetuities, because designed to be perpetual; but if it is not to go into effect until after the period allowed by said rule, it has been said that it fails ab initio. Chamberlayne v. Brockett, L. R. 8 Ch. 206. A trust for charitable uses may depend for its going into effect upon a condition to be performed by others which may or may not be performed within the period allowed. In such case the English courts do not at once disaffirm the trust, but allow a reasonable time for the condition to be performed, and, if the condition be performed within such time, sustain the trust; if it be not, and is not likely to be, they either disaffirm the trust or apply it cy pres, if the terms in which it is declared permit, to other charitable purposes. Tyssen, Charitable Bequests, 428–427, and cases there cited. Sinnett v. Herbert, L. R. 7 Ch. 232. The American cases are not stricter, certainly, than the English on this point. Ingles v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617; McDonogh v. Murdoch, 56 U. S. 15 How. 367, 14 L. ed. 732; Ould v. Washington Hospital, 95 U. S. 303, 24 L. ed. 450; Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 397. In the last-named case, Mr. Justice Gray, citing the three cases next before mentioned, said, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, that they show that "a gift in trust for a charity not existing at the date of the gift, and the beginning of whose existence is uncertain, or which is to take effect upon a contingency that may possibly not happen within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years, is valid, provided there is no gift of the property meanwhile to be for the benefit of any private corporation or person." See also Missouri Historical Soc. v. Academy of Sciences, 94 Mo. 459, 13 West. Rep. 206; Sanderson v. White, 18 Pick. 328, 336; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 1.

Under these authorities, the bequest in the case at bar would not be instantly declared void, whatever eventually might become of it, 13 L. R. A.

even if it had remained as given in the will. It was modified by the codicil, and we must take it as modified. So taken, it is a bequest of $25,000, to be held in trust as a permanent fund for an art institute in the City of Providence, whenever the funds necessary to establish such an institute worthy of the city shall have been contributed, the income or interest of the bequest meanwhile to be distributed by the trustees in prizes as directed; or, to put it in another way, it is a bequest of $25,000 in trust for the trustees to use the income thereof for prizes as directed until the funds for an art institute in the City of Providence, worthy of the city, have been contributed, then to be invested as a permanent fund for the institute, the annual interest to be used for its benefit for all time. Such a bequest is not, in our opinion, invalid to any extent, if it may be regarded as a bequest for purely charitable uses. "When personal estate," said Lord Selborne in Chamberlayne v. Brockett, supra, "is once effectively given to charity, it is taken entirely out of the scope of the law of remoteness." Property so given may be limited over from one charity to another on any event happening at any time. Society Prop. Gosp. in F. P. v. Atty-Gen. 8 Russ. 142; Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 16 Sim. 88, 1 Macn. & G. 460; Re Conington's Will, 8 Week. Rep. 444. In the first of these cases a testator in 1715 directed his executors as soon as two Protestant bishops should be duly appointed and consecrated, one for the islands and the other for the continent of North America, to pay £1,000 to the plaintiff society, to be applied equally to settling them in their sees, and meanwhile to invest the £1,000, and apply the income for the benefit of invalidated missionaries of the society. A decree in 1717 ordered the £1,000 to be invested, and the income to be applied as directed. In fact, a great part of the income was allowed to accumulate. The appointment of the bishops was completed in 1824, and then, at the suit of the plaintiff society, the whole sum was ordered to be paid to them. In the second case property was bequeathed in 1624 to the corporation of Reading on certain charitable trusts, with a proviso that, if the corporation should neglect for a whole year to perform them, the property should be transferred to the corporation of London for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. Two hundred years later, after the corporation of Reading had neglected for twenty years to perform the trusts, the property was allowed to go over to the second charity, on the ground that it was no more a perpetuity in one charity than in another. See also Henshaw v. Atkinson, 3 Madd. 306.

We do not think there can be any doubt that the bequest here, so far as given for the art institute, is a charity. British Museum v. White, 2 Sim. & Stu. 594; Yates v. University College, L. R. 8 Ch. 454, L. R. 7 H. L. 438; Re Holburne (Coates v. Mackillop), 53 L. T. N. S. 212; Oresson's App. 80 Pa. 487. It is true the promotion of art is not specifically named as a charitable use in 43 Eliz., chap. 4; but that Statute is regarded by the courts as rather illustrative than exhaustive in its enumeration of such uses, and, when resorted to for light, is interpreted in a large way, according to its spirit, rather than its letter. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1029; Pell v. Mercer, 14 R. I. 412, 444.

A nation's art is the flower of its civilization, and it is a matter of general interest that it should flourish and improve. To see and study some of the masterpieces of the fine arts, and learn to appreciate their excellences, is itself an education that refines and enriches the mind. It follows that money for an institution that affords opportunity for this, while it at the same time gives encouragement to artistic production, is a public benefit.

But it is argued that, even if the final bequest of the principal sum is charitable, the intermediate bequest of the income is not, since it has no tendency to advance education or learning, and only provides a premium for proficiency in the production of articles of luxury; that in fact its purpose is private rather than public, and consequently the entire bequest is invalidated by it. The argument does not convince us. The purpose of the prizes is not simply to give a little money every year to the successful artists, but also to arouse the ambition of Rhode Island artists everywhere, and incite their best endeavors. This would be much, if it were all. It is not all. The competing works must be brought together for judgment, and, in the careful comparison of work with work that will follow, the merits and the faults of each will come to light, instinctively, for all concerned. Further, when such works are gathered, they attract attention; people come to see and enjoy them; the competition among their authors provokes discussion and criticism; public sympathy is enlisted; public interest grows and spreads; and the minds of men more readily open for the reception of artistic truths and conceptions. Thus gradually an atmosphere is generated in which the fine arts can flourish; for it is a general law that a fine art must find favor in the popular heart before it can reach perfection in the productions of the artists. Then, too, the prizes are more than money. They bring honor and distinction and assurance of appreciation, vastly more precious to the artists than the prizes themselves. The efficiency of prizes, as an incentive to excellence, is generally recognized, and it is common knowledge that numerous trusts for the distribution of prizes or premiums exist, whose validity has never been questioned. There are cases in which such trusts for proper purposes have been sustained. Thompson v. Thompson, 1 Coll. 881; American Academy of A. and S. v. Harvard College, 12 Gray, 582.

Our conclusion is that the bequest here in question is in every respect a lawful charity. The will of said Albert J. Jones has the following residuary clause: "The rest and residue of the property found standing in my name I bequeath to the children of my sister, Mrs. Emily A. Hall, and those of my deceased brother, John Davis Jones, to be equally divided among them." The codicil has the following: "The legacy to the children of my deceased brother John D. Jones, and my sister Emily A. Hall, is to the children of the first generation." At the date of the will Mrs. Hall had one child, a son, who still survives, and three grandchildren, children of a son previously deceased." John D. Jones had three children who survived the testator, and one grandchild, daughter of a son previously deceased. The grandchildren claim to be entitled to take under the residuary clause by virtue of Pub. Stat. R. I., chap. 182, § 14, as follows: "Whenever any child, grandchild or other person having a devise or bequest of real or personal estate shall die before the testator, leaving a lineal descendant, such descendant shall take the estate, real or personal, as devisee or legatee, in the same way and manner as such devisee or legatee would have done in case he had survived the testator." We do not think said provision is capable of a construction that will sustain the claim. It applies only where a person "having a devise or bequest" dies before the testator. The son of Mrs. Hall, who was the father of her said grandchildren, never had any devise or bequest under the will of Albert J. Jones, since he was dead, and so incapable of taking, by devise or bequest, before the will was made. For anything that appears, the testator knew that he was dead when he made the will, and consequently could not even have intended to bequeath him anything. The same may be said of the son of John D. Jones, the father of John D. Jones' said grandchild. The purpose of the Statute is obvious. At common law, where a legacy is given to a person who subsequently dies before the testator, it lapses; that is, it either falls into the residue, or, if it be residuary, becomes intestate. Under the Statute, instead of lapsing, it goes to the legatee's descendants, on the assumption that the testator would rather have it go to them than have it lapse. 4 Kent, Com. 541, note b.

Our conclusion is: first, that the legacy of $25,000 is valid; and, second, that the three children of Mrs. Hall's deceased son, and the daughter of John D. Jones' deceased son, are not entitled to share in the residue.

1. The disposal of sewage from a number of cities and towns containing one sixth of the population of the State is a matter of general public utility for which the Legislature can properly appropriate money from the state treasury.

2. Cities and towns are not exempted from the power of the Legislature to subject them to the burden of assessments for local improvements by the fact that

NOTE.—Sewage: authority of Legislature over subject.

The 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution L. R. A.

stitution is not designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, the improvements are of such general public utility that the Legislature might lawfully pay the expense thereof with money of the State.

3. The title to works of public improvement need not be given to cities or towns by the Legislature, in order to subject them to the expense of such works.
4. The Legislature can delegate to commissioners to be appointed by a court the power to determine the proportions of expense to be paid by different counties, towns or cities for a local improvement.
5. No rule need be laid down by the Legislature for the guidance of commissioners in making an apportionment among cities and towns subject to acceptance by a court of the expenses of a system of sewage disposal, other than to direct them to determine it as they shall deem just and equitable, where the State Constitution gives power to make "all manner of wholesome orders, laws, etc.," not repugnant thereto.
6. Benefit to property is not the only consideration to be regarded in apportioning among cities and towns the expense of a system of sewage disposal, but there are many elements to be considered, some of which are the exigencies or special need of such improvements, the area to be accommodated, the present or probable population and wealth, the value of the land and its adaptability for homes and other uses.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (W. Allen, J.) for the opinion of the full court of a petition for the appointment of commissioners to determine the proportion in which the cities and towns affected by an Act providing for a system of sewage disposal for the Mystic and Charles River Valleys should contribute towards the expense of such system. Decrees for petitioners.

On June 7, 1889, an Act was passed for the purpose of providing means for the disposal of sewage from certain cities and towns. By the Act two systems were established, one called the North Metropolitan Sewerage System, and composed of the Cities of Boston, Cambridge, Somerville, Malden, Chelsea and Woburn, and the Towns of Stoneham, Melrose, Winchester, Arlington, Belmont, Medford, Everett and Winthrop, the other called the Charles River Valley System, and composed of the Cities of Boston, Waltham and Newton and the Towns of Watertown and Brookline.

Under this Act petitioners were duly appoint-morals, education and good order of the people. Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923.

The general purposes of taxation are, first, the defense of the Commonwealth; second, the administration of justice; third, expense of public works and instructions, and fourth, the expense of supporting the dignity of the State. Smith, Wealth of Nations, 244.

The discretionary power of the Legislature in the distribution of public burdens has been for a long time recognised by this court. Norwich v. Hampshire County Comrs. 13 Pick. 60; Atty-Gen. v. Cambridge, 16 Gray, 247; Salem Turnp. & C. B. Corp. v. Essex County, 100 Mass. 232.

Without a public use or service especially declared in the statute providing for a public improvement, or implied from the nature of the object of the expenditure, taxation in any form cannot be justified. Lowell v. Oliver, 8 Allen, 247; Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 570; Dorgan v. Boston, 12 Allen, 223; Merrick v. Amherst, Id. 500.

It is not necessary that the entire community should directly enjoy or participate in an improvement or enterprise in order to constitute a public use, and if lands are taken for a public use and for the benefit of the community, it is of no importance that individuals may incidentally derive some advantage therefrom. Boston & R. Mill Corp. v. Newman, 12 Pick. 467; Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417.

Although a tax be sanctioned by state statutes, if it be not for a public purpose it is an unauthorized taking of private property. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 51, 26 L. ed. 659; Citizens Sav. & L. Assn. v. Topeka, 37 U. S. 30 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455; McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. ed. 335.

The term "public purposes," as employed to denote the objects for which taxes may be levied, has no relation to the urgency of the public need or to the extent of the public benefit which is to follow. People v. Salem Twp. Board, 20 Mich. 452.

Public considerations, however, must be involved to justify such legislation, as providing for drainage for private use is unauthorized. Anderson v. Kerns Drain Co. 14 Ind. 202; People v. Saginaw County Suprs. 26 Mich. 22; Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333; Cypress Pond Drain. Co. v. Hooper, 2 Met. (Ky.) 850.

The interest of the public which authorizes taxation must be a direct public interest (Curtiss v. Whipple, 24 Wis. 350); for when the power to tax is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public interest or welfare, it ceases to be taxation, and becomes oppression, if not plunder. Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 421; Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 575; Hooper v. Emery, 14 Me. 379; People v. Salem Twp. Board, 20 Mich. 459; Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 92; Allen v. Jay, 6 Me. 139; Grim v. Weissenberg School Dist. 37 Pa. 433; Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 624; Citizens Sav. & Loan Assn. v. Topeka, 37 U. S. 30 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455.

In general the Legislature is the sole arbiter of what shall constitute a public use. Bloomfield & R. N. Gas Light Co. v. Richardson, 68 Barb. 437.

Taxation for expenses of public improvements: public uses, what are.

Among public uses and purposes, taxation for which may be authorised by the Legislature, may be stated the following:

The draining of low lands for the preservation of the public health is a public purpose. New Orleans Draining Co. 11 La. Ann. 333; Anderson v. Kerns Drain. Co. 14 Ind. 202; Woodruff v. Fisher, 17 Barb. 224; Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166; Sessions v. Crunkilton, 20 Ohio St. 349.

So the reclaiming of swamp and overflowed and marsh lands is a public purpose, and a scheme of improvement of this character is of such public utility as to justify the Legislature in the exercise of its discretionary powers in promoting the improvement. Alcorn v. Hamer, 38 Miss. 663; Dally v. Swope, 47 Miss. 387; Egyptian Levee Co. v. Hardin, 37 Mo. 426; Tidewater Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 521; People v. Nearing, 37 N. Y. 303.

The removal of dams to facilitate the flow of offensive stagnant water to promote the health of a district is a public purpose. Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417; Dingley v. Boston, 100 Mass. 544; Miller v. Craig, 11 N. J. Eq. 175.

Railroads are for public purposes, and subscription to the stock of a railroad company may be authorized (Hanson v. Vernon, 27 Iowa, 49); for it is the right and duty of the State to advance the commerce and promote the welfare of the people. Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147.

ed a board of Metropolitan Sewerage Commissioners, and were given charge of the work. After commencing operations they filed this petition for the appointment of the commissioners provided for by § 18 of the Act to determine the proportion in which the respective cities and towns should contribute towards the expense of the improvement.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. E. Pillsbury, Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth, and William D. Turner for the petitioners.

Messrs. Samuel J. Elder, for Winchester, George E. Smith, for Everett, Selwyn Z. Bowman, for Somerville, Jesse F. Wheeler, for Watertown, William B. Stevens, for Stoneham, J. O. Telle, for Winthrop, Frank E. Fitz, for Chelsea, respondents:

The funds of the Commonwealth, contributed by taxation by the people from all over the State, for the public uses of the Commonwealth, cannot be used for constructing and maintaining local improvements for special towns or cities.

Const. pt. 2, chap. 1, § 4; Const. art. 11, chap. 2; Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 579.

That the tax is not levied as a special tax, or that the amount required is borrowed by the State upon an issue of its bonds, which bonds may or may not have to be paid by the State in the future, makes no difference in principle.

Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454.

This right of appropriation of taxes paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth must clearly appear to exist; it cannot be established by any doubtful or uncertain interpretation of the Constitution.

Lowell v. Oliver, 8 Allen, 252; Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 575.

In those cases where it has been held that the Legislature could authorize the expenditure of the money of the Commonwealth, it has been so held on the ground that the money was to be expended either for the benefit of the people of the State, as a whole, or in pursuance of a duty incumbent upon the Commonwealth as such.

Freeland v. Hastings, 10 Allen, 570; Lowell v. Oliver, 8 Allen, 247; Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 584; Fowler v. Danvers, 8 Allen, 80; Grover v. Pembroke, 11 Allen, 88.

In Freeland v. Hastings, supra, the court laid stress upon the question whether the charge was of such a public nature that the Legislature could distribute the burden "by taxation among the whole people of the Commonwealth."

See also Com. v. Plaisted, 2 L. R. A. 142, 148 Mass. 875; Dorgan v. Boston, 12 Allen, 235;

So, the purchase of land for railroads is a public purpose. Bennington v. Park, 50 Vt. 178; First Nat. Bank of St. Johnsbury v. Concord, Id. 237.

The renting of buildings for the use of the State is a public purpose for which the Legislature may provide by taxation within constitutional limits. Harris v. Dubuclet, 30 La. Ann. 662.

Educational purposes are public purposes. So the maintaining the common-school system, whereby one man is taxed to pay for the education of children of other parents, is within the discretionary power of the Legislature (Felty v. Uhler, 10 Phila. 512; Com. v. Hartman, 17 Pa. 118); and the Legislature may assess a general tax for distribution under an Act to establish the school fund for the support of such schools. Opinion of Justices, 68 Me. 582.

Construction of sewers; late Massachusetts decisions.

In Massachusetts the construction of sewers may be justified under the police power in making regulations for the preservation of the public health. Boston v. Shaw, 1 Met. 180.

A statute authorizing a city council to lay down sewers through streets and private lands, on payment to the owners of damages they may sustain, is constitutional and valid. Hildreth v. Lowell, 11 Gray, 345.

The board may pass an order for a single structure to serve both as a conduit for a stream and as a common sewer, and may assess upon those benefited their proportional part of the expense of the structure as a sewer. Gray v. Boston, 139 Mass. 328. See Bennett v. New Bedford, 110 Mass. 433.

An order of the city council directing a main drain to be laid upon petition alleging convenience of the city is a sufficient adjudication of the necessity therefor. Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 223.

Sewer assessments may, as a mode of equitable adjustment, be divided by the mayor and aldermen of a city into three classes,—direct benefit, remote benefit and more remote benefit. Collins v. Holyoke, 5 New Eng. Rep. 909, 146 Mass. 307.

The validity of their assessment is not affected by the fact that they called in another person to assist in making it. Taber v. New Bedford, 135 Mass. 162.

The failure of the superintendent of sewers to keep an account of the cost of construction and to report to the board a list of persons benefited did not invalidate the assessment. Dickinson v. Worcester, 128 Mass. 565.

Nor is it an objection to the validity of an assessment that the town had not adopted any system of sewerage, although authorized to do so. Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384.

In determining the amount of the assessment the relative benefit which each estate on the line of the sewer may receive is immaterial. Snow v. Fitchburg, 136 Mass. 183; Workman v. Worcester, 118 Mass. 161; Keith v. Boston, 120 Mass. 108; French v. Lowell, 117 Mass. 363, explained in Snow v. Fitchburg, supra.

The assessment should be made according to the value of the land exclusive of buildings. Snow v. Fitchburg, 136 Mass. 183; Boston v. Shaw, 1 Met. 180; Downer v. Boston, 7 Cush. 277; Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 223; Springfield v. Gay, 19 Allen, 612; Brewer v. Springfield, 97 Mass. 152.

Under a statute apportioning the expense according to the value of the land, an apportionment according to the value of the land and buildings was held void. Patton v. Springfield, 99 Mass. 627; Wright v. Boston, Downer v. Boston and Springfield v. Gay, supra.

In estimating the benefits, the fact that the land is released from the servitude of an old drain is not to be considered. French v. Lowell, 117 Mass. 363. See State v. Jersey City, 20 N. J. L. 441.

The time within which the assessment of benefits may be made is within the discretion of the board whose duty it is to make the assessments. Fairbanks v. Fitchburg, 132 Mass. 42.

Where a common sewer is intended not only to serve as an outlet or means of discharge for other common sewers, but also to benefit the lands abutting upon it, no part of the cost need be assessed upon the owners of lands along the line of the tributary sewers. Ayer v. Somerville, 3 New Eng. Rep. 735, 145 Mass. 586; Fairbanks v. Fitchburg, 132 Mass. 42.

Moore v. Sanford, 7 L. R. A. 151, 151 Mass. 285.

The theory of the Betterment Laws is that assessments shall only be made for any special benefit and advantage "beyond the general advantages to all real estate."

Pub. Stat. chap. 51, § 1.

Upon this doctrine, the State having no right to pay the money at all, except upon the theory that it is paid for the general advantage, how can it afterwards collect that same money from towns, upon the theory that it was paid for the particular advantage of those towns?

See Cooley, Const. 6th ed. 233, 284; Hastbrouck v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 87; Mills v. Charleston, 29 Wis. 400; People v. Chicago, 51 Ill. 17; People v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228.

If the improvement was a public improvement, the assessment could not be made upon those more particularly interested.

Graham v. Conger, 85 Ky. 582; Conger v. Bergman (Ky.) March 9, 1889.

If the tax provided for in this Act is in the nature of a betterment assessment, for benefits to be conferred by the works to be built upon the inhabitants' estates or municipalities in this district, then the tax will not, under the Act, be laid, as betterments always have been laid, nor as the Constitution specifies.

Assessments for local public improvements must be proportional and reasonable.

Gleason v. McKay, 134 Mass. 419; Cheshire v. Berkshire County Comrs. 118 Mass. 886; Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. 12 Allen, 800; Merrick v. Amherst, 12 Allen, 501; Jones v. Boston, 104 Mass. 467; Boylston Market Assn. v. Boston, 113 Mass. 580.

Property can only be assessed for public improvements on the principle that benefits are received by the property from the construction of the work, and the assessment should never exceed the benefit conferred; and it is essential that it shall appear from the proceedings themselves that such was the principle on which the assessment was made.

Crausford v. People, 82 Ill. 557; New Orleans Draining Co. 11 La. Ann. 388; Creighton v. Manson, 27 Cal. 613; Re Fourth Ave. 8 Wend. 452; Nichols v. Bridgeport, 28 Conn. 204; Tide-Water Co. v. Coaler, 18 N. J. Eq. 518.

An Act of the Legislature authorizing commissioners to apportion the expense among the different cities and towns of the district, as they may deem just and equitable, without distributing the burden, or prescribing the standard by which such distribution shall be made, is unconstitutional.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The constitutionality of the Statute of 1889, chap. 439, is attacked by the different respondents on several grounds.

The first objection is, that the object in view, which is to provide for the disposal of sewage from a number of cities and towns, is not of such a character that the Legislature can properly appropriate money in furtherance of it from the treasury of the Commonwealth. It 12 L. R. A.

is admitted that public money of the Commonwealth may properly be expended in aid of the construction of roads, bridges, canals and railroads, to increase facilities for communication, and this has occasionally been done, from early times. By Prov. Stat. 1698, 1694, chap. 22, 1 Prov. Stat. 158, a grant of £150 from the treasury of the Province was made towards rebuilding and repairing the bridge over Charles River; and by Prov. Stat. 1699, 1700, chap. 11, 1 Prov. Stat. 388, a grant of £153 was made for the same purpose. In recent years, the statutes granting state aid to railroads are freshly in mind; for example, to the Western, Stat. 1836, chap. 181; to the Troy & Greenfield, Stat. 1854, chap. 226; to the Boston, Hartford & Erie, Stat. 1866, chap. 142; to the Willamaburg & North Adams, Stat. 1867, chap. 321; to the Lee & New Haven, Stat. 1868, chap. 313. It is contended, however, that a statute for providing a system for the disposal of sewage does not fall within the same reason, and cannot be considered as providing for an object of general public utility, but that the benefits to be derived from it are essentially local in their operation, and do not in any sense include the whole people, and therefore that the public money of the Commonwealth ought not to be expended for it.

Assuming that the respondents may so far represent the general public as to be entitled to raise this question, it is plain that the objection can hardly be considered as of great weight, since the decision in Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417. It was there held, on the greatest consideration, that the Legislature might provide for the removal of a dam, by means of which a large tract of land situated in different towns, and owned by a large number of persons, was overflowed, and might provide for compensation out of the treasury of the Commonwealth, to persons whose property was thereby injured. —the court saying: "It has never been deemed essential that the entire community or any considerable portion of it should directly enjoy or participate in an improvement or enterprise, in order to constitute a public use, within the true meaning of these words, as used in the Constitution," p. 425. The improvement which the Statute of 1889 is designed to effect stands far stronger, as an object of general public utility, than that which was the subject of consideration in Talbot v. Hudson. It has for its purpose to promote the public health, to avert disease and prevent nuisances. The territory to be benefited according to the report of the state board of health, to which we are referred, includes an area of 180 square miles, and contains one sixth of the population of the State.

The Legislature has declared that a system of sewerage to accommodate this territory and this portion of the people of the State is an object of public utility, such as warrants the expenditure or the advancement for the time being of money from the treasury of the Commonwealth. It is impossible for us to say to the contrary. The argument is made to us that, if such an expenditure of public money is warranted, the Legislature might authorize an appropriation for the benefit of a single town, and construct and maintain forever a local improvement for such town. But in determining the power of the Legislature in a case like this, little assistance is obtained by imagining extreme instances of possible abuse of the power. Norwich v. Hampshire County Comrs. 18 Pick. 60, 62. Nor need we undertake to define how far the Legislature might properly go, in a special emergency, in giving direct assistance to a particular town. Those curious in prosecuting such an inquiry may find examples of what has been done in the past, in Stat. 1874, chap. 326, providing for the payment of $100,000 towards the expenses of rebuilding roads and bridges in the Town of Williamsburg, which had been destroyed by a flood; and in earlier times in the grants to Boston of £800 in 1752 for the relief of the poor, on account of the small pox, and of £1100 in 1760, on account of losses by fire. 3 Prov. Stat. 606; 4 Prov. Stat. 440. See also Moore v. Sanford, 151 Mass. 285, 7 L. R. A. 151; Lowell v. Oliver, 8 Allen, 247, 256. It is enough for us to say that no valid objection lies to the Statute of 1889, on this ground.

It is further objected, that if the object contemplated by the Statute is one of such general public utility that the public money of the Commonwealth may properly be expended or advanced for it, then the expense ought to be borne by the Commonwealth, and cannot properly be assessed upon certain particular cities and towns. But this objection rests upon too narrow a view of the powers of the Legislature, in respect to the proper distribution of the public burdens. The provision of the Constitution conferring these powers is as follows: "Full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said general court from time to time to make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same." It was said in Bingham & Q. B. & Turnp. Corp. v. Norfolk County, 6 Allen, 353, 358, that "among the purposes for which it [this power] is to be exerted, none is more essential than a wise and careful distribution of certain public burdens or duties. Of these, a leading one is the construction, support and maintenance of roads and bridges." The construction and support of a system for the disposal of sewage, like that provided for by Stat. 1889, fall within the same reason. Dingley v. Boston, 100 Mass. 544, 557. And in reference to these and other like burdens, it may be said in general that it is within the proper province of the Legislature to determine where they shall rest, either in the first instance or finally. The Legislature may properly determine that the whole or a part of the cost shall be borne by the Commonwealth, or it may impose it wholly upon counties, or wholly upon towns, or a part upon each. And in doing so it is not necessarily limited by county or town lines. Indeed, as has often been declared, the Legislature may change county or town lines at will, and may provide how their respective properties and debts shall be shared and adjusted. Opinion of Justices, 6 Cush. 578; Stone v. Charlestown, 114 Mass. 214; Coolidge v. Brookline, Id. 592; Weymouth & B. 12 L. R. A.

F. Dist. v. Norfolk County Comrs. 108 Mass. 142; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 386, 2 L. R. A. 142. Instead of changing lines, the Legislature may apportion the burdens in such a manner as will tend to secure fairness and equality. Absolute equality in the distribution of burdens of course is not to be hoped for. But with a view to the nearest approach to it that is possible, the Constitution wisely vests a large and general power in the Legislature. And if at any time it is found either from a change of circumstances or otherwise that the burden presses too hardly upon a particular town or county, the Legislature may change it. Nor does the fact that the money has been advanced in the first instance from the treasury of the Commonwealth prevent the Legislature from providing for a reimbursement from counties, cities or towns. It may often be more convenient, and is conspicuously so in the case before us, to have the money thus advanced in the first instance, and afterwards apportioned upon those cities and towns which are finally to pay it, and this course has sometimes been followed in requiring a county to pay in the first instance from the county treasury for an improvement the cost of which was ultimately to be borne wholly or in part by towns. In such cases it is virtually a lending of money, like the grants of state aid to railroads.

The statutes and decisions which illustrate and establish the validity of such a distribution of the burden of local improvements are too numerous to be described separately, but examples may be cited. In some instances, a fixed sum or a definite prescribed proportion of the cost, and of the expense of the future maintenance, has been imposed upon the general public treasury and upon counties and towns, or merely upon counties and towns. Prov. Stat. 1698, 1694, chap. 5, 1 Prov. Stat. 185; 1698, 1694, chap. 22, 1 Prov. Stat. 158; 1699, 1700, chap. 11, 1 Prov. Stat. 383; Resolve of June 18, 1700, 1 Prov. Stat. 419; Stat. 1795, Feb. 10; 2 Mass. Spec. Laws, 3; 1831, chap. 41, considered in Norwich v. Hampshire County Comrs. 18 Pick. 60; 1860, chap. 140; 1876, chap. 51. In some instances, the whole burden has been put upon counties. Prov. Stat. 1770, 1771, chap. 31, 5 Prov. Stat. 188; Stat. 1798, March 15; 1 Mass. Spec. Laws, 421; 1835, chap. 38. In some, the burden has been upon the county in the first instance, with a provision for reimbursement. Stat. 1782, May 7; 1 Mass. Spec. Laws, 27; 1875, chap. 193. In some instances, it has been put solely upon cities or towns, either one or more. Prov. Stat. 1699, 1700, chap. 25, 1 Prov. Stat. 405; 1736, 1737, chap. 5, 2 Prov. Stat. 795; Stat. 1832, chap. 116; 1840, chap. 52; 1854, chap. 283; 1862, chap. 65; 1868, chap. 294; 1874, chap. 139, 240, § 8, 259; 1880, chap. 159. In some instances, counties and towns have been required or authorized to contribute for improvements beyond their own borders; Stat. 1838, chap. 169; 1850, chap. 215; 1870, chap. 231; 1871, chap. 275; Carter v. Cambridge & B. B. Proprs. 104 Mass. 236; Com. v. Newburyport, 108 Mass. 129. In some instances, changes have been made by later statutes, varying the burden. Stat. 1860, chap. 95, considered in Atty-Gen. v. Cambridge, 16 Gray, 247; Stat.

1870, chap. 265, considered in Scituate v. Weymouth, 108 Mass. 128; Stat. 1880, chap. 288, considered in Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 528. See also Cambridge v. Lexington, 17 Pick. 222; Boston S. F. Soc. v. Boston, 116 Mass. 181.

It is urged by the respondents, as an objection to the view taken above, that the various cities and towns are to have no ownership in the property of the sewers and works which they are required to pay for, and no right to use the same except under rules prescribed by the Legislature. No express authority is cited in support of this objection, and we see no valid ground upon which it can rest. A town is required by law to build highways, and to keep them in repair, but it has no separate ownership nor exclusive use of them. The highway surveyors, through whose agency the roads are kept in repair, are held to be public officers, and not agents of the town. Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Barney v. Lowell, 98 Mass. 570. No doubt the Legislature might provide for the appointment of public road masters, entirely independently of the towns, and still require the towns to pay the expenses of keeping the roads in repair. It is indeed in one respect more beneficial to the cities and towns not to have the ownership or care of the sewers, because otherwise they might be held responsible for negligence in the care of them. Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41. The supposition is not to be entertained that the Commonwealth will shut off any one of the cities and towns, which are required to contribute, from the use of the sewers under reasonable rules and regulations. From the extent of the system of sewerage, and the number of towns involved, harmonious and effective management may well have been thought to be the best secured through officers of the State. It cannot for a moment be supposed that the Legislature would consciously do injustice to a particular city or town. There is no valid ground or reason on which the Legislature is bound to vest in a city or town the technical title to the works which constitute a public improvement, to which the city or town has been required to contribute. Stone v. Charlestown, 114 Mass. 214, 223, 224.

The respondents further contend that the Statute of 1889 is unconstitutional, because no standard or rule is prescribed for the commissioners who are to determine the proportions to be paid by the several cities and towns, according to which they shall fix the same; that is to say, the respondents object that the Act is invalid, because it does not provide that the assessment shall be made upon the different cities and towns according to the benefits received by each, or according to any other prescribed standard.

The provision of the Statute is, that this court shall appoint three commissioners, who shall, after due notice and hearing, and in such manner as they shall deem just and equitable, determine the proportion in which each of the cities and towns named therein shall annually pay money into the treasury of the Commonwealth for the term of five years, and shall return their award into said court; and when said award shall have been accepted by said court, the same shall be a final and conclusive adjudication, etc. Before the expiration of the 12 L. R. A.

five years, a new board of commissioners is to be appointed to make a similar award for the next five years.

It is not contended in distinct terms, and at this day it could not be successfully maintained, as a bald proposition, that the Legislature cannot delegate to commissioners, to be appointed by this court, the determination of the proportion of expense which each county, city or town shall be required to pay for a local improvement. There has been, indeed, a long-continued course of practice from very early times, shown by numerous statutes, and sanctioned by many decisions, in which such authority has been delegated. Sometimes this power has been intrusted to the county commissioners (Stat. 1884, chap. 15; 1885, chap. 56; 2841, chap. 108; 1050, chap. 215; 1854, chap. 188; 1868, chap. 88; 1864, chap. 188; 1866, chap. 265; 1867, chap. 296; 1868, chap. 80; 1869, chap. 809, § 8, considered in Haverhill Bridge Proprs. v. Essex County Comrs. 103 Mass. 120; 1869, chaps. 266, 378; 1870, chap. 219; 1871, chaps. 88, 199; 1872, chap. 129; 1874, chaps. 265, 289, 325; 1875, chap. 198); sometimes to the court of quarter-sessions, or to some other court (3 Prov. Stat. 1716, 1717, chap. 5, Prov. Stat. 44; 1759, 1760, chap. 21, vol. 4, Prov. Stat. 285; 1764, 1765, chap. 23, vol. 4, Prov. Stat. 740; 1768, chap. 12, vol. 4, Prov. Stat. 1023; Stat. 1782, May 7, vol. 1, Mass. Spec. Laws, 27); sometimes to the city council, or to the mayor and aldermen of a city (Stat. 1863, chap. 107, considered in Springfield v. Gay, 12 Allen, 612; 1863, chap. 191, considered in Hove v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 889); in one statute, at least, to the board of railroad commissioners (1869, chap. 408, § 5, considered in New London N. R. Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 102 Mass. 886); sometimes to commissioners to be specially appointed by the governor and council (Prov. Stat. 1702, chap. 11, 1 Prov. Stat. 506; Stat. 1870, chap. 265, considered in Scituate v. Weymouth, 106 Mass. 128), and sometimes to commissioners to be appointed by this or some other court. Stat. 1820, chap. 59; 1862, chap. 177, considered in Hingham & Q. B. & Turnp. Corp. v. Norfolk County, 6 Allen, 353; 1866, chap. 309, considered in Salem Turnp. & C. B. Corp. v. Essex County, 100 Mass. 282; 1868, chap. 322 and 1869, chap. 372, considered in Dow v. Wakefield, 108 Mass. 267; 1869, chaps. 142, 244, 273; 1869, chap. 161, considered in Carter v. Cambridge & B. B. Proprs. 104 Mass. 286; 1870, chaps. 182, 287, 302, 303; 1871, chap. 177, considered in Northampton Bridge Case, 116 Mass. 442; 1872, chap. 295, considered in Brayton v. Fall River, 124 Mass. 96; 1872, chaps. 180, 181; 1873, chap. 200, and 1880, chap. 286, considered in Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 528; 1875, chap. 175; 1875, chap. 200, considered in Hampshire County Comrs. Petitioners, 143 Mass. 424, 8 New Eng. Rep. 488, and 140 Mass. 181, 1 New Eng. Rep. 201.

This ample, but by no means exhaustive, citation of precedents has been made for the purpose of showing how thoroughly the method has been adopted in Massachusetts of apportioning the cost of local improvements by delegated authority.

Assuming, therefore, that this method is within the proper scope of legislative power, it remains to inquire, in the case of a public improvement like that now under consideration, where the Legislature itself has designated the cities and towns upon which the burden is to rest, how far the Legislature must go in prescribing a rule or standard for making such apportionment upon and among the cities and towns so designated; or, to be more precise, whether a statute providing that the determination shall be made in such manner as the commissioners shall deem just and equitable; and subject to acceptance by this court, must be held to be insufficient and invalid.

In approaching this question, it is well to bear in mind the peculiar character of the public improvement which is provided for in the Statute. In nearly all of the Statutes allowing or requiring assessments either upon property, persons or municipal corporations, for local improvements, the object primarily in view has been the benefit to land. Even in such cases Legislatures and courts have not usually found it expedient to lay down any definite rule, according to which the assessment or apportionment of the cost should be made; but in a case like the present peculiar difficulties arise, growing out of the nature of the improvement and of the objects sought to be accomplished. No doubt the Legislature might have dealt with the matter directly, and itself have fixed the proportion of the cost which each city or town should pay; and might change this proportion from time to time. No valid ground of complaint would be open to any city or town, if this course had been pursued. But apparently it was thought by the Legislature that a more careful and detailed consideration was expedient, of the various elements which ought to enter into the determination of the question, with the aid of arguments, and with more deliberation than it is practicable for the Legislature itself to give. But whether the apportionment of cost is to be made by the Legislature or by some tribunal or commission specially authorized, it is difficult to see how anything like an exact rule or standard of apportionment can be fixed. In an action at law to recover damages for an actual sickness or injury to person or property or reputation, from the tort of an individual or a corporation, it can only be said that the damages should be such as will be compensatory, but there is no rule except the estimation of a jury of the loss which the plaintiff has suffered, and this must necessarily depend somewhat upon the feelings or temperament of the jurors. But in a case like this which is now before us, that which is to be paid for by the cities and towns is the probability of better health and greater personal comfort for the people at large from the carrying out of the proposed improvement. It is very plain that there is, and in the nature of the case can be, no means of an accurate measurement, no matter what tribunal has to deal with the subject. All that could be done by any tribunal would be to take into view all the various elements and considerations that might appear to have a just bearing upon the question, and determine as fairly as possible what is just and equitable under all the circumstances. Absolute accuracy or equality being out of the question, as impracticable, shall it be declared that the Legislature must lay down some artificial rule for the guidance of the commissioners, when it is plain that no artificial rule can define or include all the elements which it might be proper to consider? When the rule is laid down that an assessment shall be made in proportion to the benefits received, this usually has reference to a benefit to property, which is appreciable, and may to some extent be ascertained by inquiring as to the value of property in the market. A town may no doubt in a certain sense be said to be benefited by anything which improves the health or comfort of its inhabitants, and indirectly the value of property may also be increased. But if, as will presently be shown by a reference to decided cases, such a rule is not necessarily to be applied in cases where the improvement is chiefly for the advantage of property, by a still stronger reason it must be deemed insufficient and unsuitable in a case like the present. Where a great public work of establishing an extensive system of sewerage is entered upon, for the use of many different cities and towns, there are many elements which ought to be taken into consideration in apportioning the cost; for instance, the exigency or special need of such an improvement in particular localities, the area which can be accommodated, the present or probable population or wealth of the different cities or towns, the value of the land and its adaptability for homes, factories or other places of business; and other elements which cannot be fully enumerated in advance. It cannot be laid down as a rule that in the distribution and apportionment of this public burden it is necessary to aim at exact equality or proportion, according to any rule or standard which is to be laid down and defined beforehand. The apportionment should be just and equitable, under all the circumstances which may be found to exist. In the determination, there must necessarily be a large discretion as to the weight which is to be given to particular considerations. It should not, however, be understood that the discretion is wholly arbitrary. It is limited and defined by the requirement that the proportion shall be determined in such manner as the commissioners shall deem just and equitable; and this discretion is to be exercised under the supervision and subject to the sanction of this court. No doubt an award which should be found to be extravagant and unreasonable would be rejected. The commissioners are made, in a sense, officers of the court. The provision that their award shall take effect only when it shall have been accepted by the court implies a right of the parties to be heard upon the question of acceptance. Even without an express provision to that effect, it has been held repeatedly that when commissioners are appointed by this court, their award must be returned into court for acceptance. Hingham & Q. B. & Turnp. Corp. v. Norfolk County, 6 Allen, 853; Brayton v. Fall River, 124 Mass. 95; Wyman v. Eastern R. Co. 128 Mass. 346. It is therefore to be assumed that in the exercise of the discretion confided to the commissioners no rule of law or equity will be violated, and that the cities and towns will have all the protection to which they are entitled. It is conceded in the argument that they are not entitled, as a matter of constitutional right, to appeal to a jury; as, indeed, individuals are not, in similar cases. Sunderland Bridge Case, 122 Mass. 450; Northampton Bridge Case, 116 Mass. 442; Hove v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 888. In other respects relating to the obligations imposed upon them, their rights are not the same as the rights of individuals of other corporations. Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 526, 530, and cases cited.

It is not necessary at present to go into this question further than to hold that in order to ascertain the proper proportions to be paid by several different cities and towns, for a public improvement, consisting of an extensive system of sewerage available to be used by them all, the Legislature, if it sees fit to do so, may properly provide that this court shall appoint disinterested commissioners, who, after due notice and a hearing, shall determine such proportions in such manner as they shall deem just and equitable, and return their award into court; and that when accepted by the court the award shall be binding. Even after the acceptance by this court of such an award, the Legislature, if it does not like it, may still provide by new legislation for a new scheme for the future distribution of the burden. Scituate v. Weymouth, 106 Mass. 128; Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 528. The final authority still rests with the Legislature; and no doubt if it saw fit to do so, it might itself appoint the commissioners, with directions to make their report directly to the Legislature.

This conclusion is well supported by the practice which has prevailed, and the course of judicial decisions in this Commonwealth. As already observed, these have chiefly related to improvements designed primarily to increase the value of land, and not adopted with special view to the health of the people. In a few instances the benefit to property has been prescribed as the basis of assessment. Examples of this are found in Prov. Stat. 1702, chap. 11, vol. 1, Prov. Stat. 506; Stat. 1869, chap. 142.

More often, however, the assessment is to be laid upon persons, estates, cities or towns which are found to be benefited without any rule being prescribed that the assessments shall be in proportion to the benefits. In such cases, the selection of the cities and towns by the court or commissioners is a substitute for the designation by the Legislature itself, and it is often added in the statutes that, upon the cities and towns selected, the assessment shall be just and equal, or equitable, or reasonable. Stat. 1820, chap. 59; 1862, chap. 177; 1868, chap. 107; 1868, chap. 309, §§ 8, 8; 1868, chap. 322; 1869, chaps. 161, 244, 266, 278; 1870, chaps. 182, 219, 237, 265; 1871, chaps. 177, 199; 1872, chaps. 129-131, 295; 1873, chap. 200; 1874, chap. 239; 1875, chaps. 175, 198, 200; 1878, chap. 110.

In other instances the statutes have made no reference at all to benefits, but have simply required that the assessments should be in proportion to value, or should be just and equitable, or something like that. Stat. 1863, chap. 191; 1865, chap. 159; 1867, chap. 296; 1870, chaps. 302, 303; 1871, chap. 38; 1874, chap. 265. See also Stat. 1863, chap. 88.

In still other instances, assessments for local improvements have been authorized or directed, with no rule or suggestion whatever to show on what principle they should be made. Prov. Stat. 1716, 1717, chap. 5 vol. 2, Prov. Stat. 44; Prov. Stat. 1764-65, chap. 23, vol. 4, Prov. Stat. 740; Prov. Stat. 1768, chap. 12, vol. 4, Prov. Stat. 1023; Stat. 1863, chap. 177, the provision as to counties; 1865, chap. 88; 1866, chap. 265; 1868, chap. 80; 1869, chap. 378.

By Stat. 1884, chap. 15, and 1885, chap. 56, the county commissioners were authorized to lay a portion of the expense upon the county without other limits than that in one case it was to be not more, and in the other case not less, than one half. In all such cases it must have been assumed by the Legislature that the determination should be just and equitable, or reasonable, and it would probably be no strained construction to hold that such a provision was implied, just as the law implies reasonable time in the construction of contracts where no time is specified.

The omission to prescribe a fixed rule for the assessment of the cost of local improvements has been vindicated in numerous decisions of this court. The case of Hingham & Q. B. & Turnp. Corp. v. Norfolk County, 6 Allen, 358, arose under Stat. 1862, chap. 177, by which a turnpike and bridges were made a public highway; and commissioners to be appointed by this court were to award the damages, and also "to determine and decree in what proportions said amount shall be paid by the Counties of Norfolk and Plymouth respectively." No rule was given to guide the assessment as to the counties. An award was made that the County of Norfolk should pay three quarters of the amount that was fixed upon as damages; and that county objected to the acceptance of the award, assigning, amongst other grounds, that the Legislature had exceeded its constitutional powers, in delegating legislative and judicial powers to the commissioners, and in imposing unequal and unjust burdens upon counties and towns. The argument is not fully reported, but a reference to the original brief shows that it was contended, amongst other things, on behalf of the county, that the Statute was unconstitutional, because no rule of apportionment was adopted as to the share of the counties; that as to the towns, reference was had to the doctrine of benefits, but in reference to the counties the decision was entirely arbitrary; that the property of the county was subjected to the decree of the commissioners, with no right of appeal and that the power of determining what counties or towns shall bear burdens, or the distribution of benefits, could not be delegated, being reposed in the Legislature. But it was held that the statute was valid, under the clause of the Constitution before cited, authorizing the Legislature to make all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws.

The case of Dorgan v. Boston, 12 Allen, 223, arose under Stat. 1865, chap. 159, providing that the expense of widening a street should be assessed upon the abutting estates in proportion to their value, as they should be appraised by the mayor and aldermen of the city when the improvements have been made. The whole principle of assessing the cost of local improvements upon abutters was attacked in the argument. The court, in the course of the elaborate judgment, sustaining the validity of the statute, said: 'Nor can it be contended that the Constitution, in regard to this species of taxation, furnishes any fixed rules of proportion, or gives any absolute standard by which to determine whether a particular tax is within the limits of the legitimate exercise of the power granted. Undoubtedly a very wide discretion was intended to be left to the Legislature as to the subjects and method of executing the authority conferred on them of imposing taxes for purposes other than those of a general nature; and yet the power is not wholly without limit." p. 287. The requirement that taxes should be proportional does not apply to such a case. pp. 240, 241. See also Merrick v. Amherst, 12 Allen, 500.

The case of Springfield v. Gay, 19 Allen, 612, arose under Stat. 1868, chap. 107, authorizing the city council of Springfield to construct certain drains, and with the assistance of a competent engineer to determine what portion of the expense should be borne by the city and what portion by the owners of real estate; the latter portion to be equitably and ratably assessed upon the owners. §§ 3, 4. No other rule for the assessment was given. An owner of land objected to the tax assessed upon him. The court, in sustaining its validity, said: "The Statute does not require that the assessments imposed on estates to defray the expense of building sewers should be assessed accordingly to the benefits which each estate might receive from their construction. It prescribes no fixed rule or standard by which such assessments should be laid. The only limitation on the power of the assessors is, that they should be equitably and ratably assessed. The rule or basis of the assessment is left entirely to the judgment and discretion of the assessors." p. 615. "We can readily see that it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to make an assessment which would operate fairly and equally, based on an estimate of the benefits which each estate might derive from the construction of the sewer. These benefits would necessarily be conjectural and difficult of estimation." p. 616.

Without further quotation from the language of decisions, it was also held that the assessment need not be in proportion to the benefits received, in Workman v. Worcester, 118 Mass. 168, 177; Keith v. Boston, 120 Mass. 108, 112, and Snow v. Fitchburg, 136 Mass. 183. Other elements which might be considered are mentioned in Com. v. Newburyport, 103 Mass. 129, 184; Boston S. F. Soc. v. Boston, 116 Mass. 181, 183, and Snow v. Fitchburg, supra. The power to delegate the determination to commissioners, and the general character of their investigation, are stated in Salem Turnp. & C. B. Corp. v. Essex County, 100 Mass. 282; Dow v. Wakefield, 108 Mass. 267, 273; Scituate v. Weymouth, 108 Mass. 128; Brayton v. Fall River, 124 Mass. 95; Agawam v. Hampden County, 180 Mass. 538.

The authorities cited by the respondents from Vermont, New Jersey and Michigan show that different views of the legislative power prevail in those States. If the question were entirely new, these decisions would be entitled to and would have great weight with us; but they are not consistent with the views which we entertain of the powers vested in the Legislature by our own Constitution.

It is further contended that the assessment provided for by the Statute cannot be upheld, because it is to be levied and collected before the ascertainment of the cost, by the actual completion of the work. But we are at a loss to see how a public work can be carried on unless the means are raised for current expenses before its completion; and there can be "no valid distinction in principle between a right to raise money for a specific object yet to be accomplished, and a right to raise it to defray the expense of the same object after it has been attained." Lowell v. Oliver, 8 Allen, 247, 257; Carier v. Cambridge & B. B. Proprs. 104 Mass. 236, 239.

It is urged in behalf of the Town of Stoneham that it has no local sewers, except a main drain, and that the system for the disposal of sewage will be of no benefit to the town. The town may, nevertheless, be in need of a system of local sewers, and may have one before the general system provided for by the Statute of 1869 is completed. The weight of this objection is not for us, at this stage of the proceedings.

The special considerations urged in behalf of the Town of Winthrop, growing out of the fact that it already has an established and satisfactory system of local sewers, discharging into the ocean, are also proper to be laid before the commissioners, but cannot be taken into account by us in the present hearing.

None of the objections taken to the validity of the Statute being found to be valid, the petitioners are entitled to maintain their petition for the appointment of commissioners to determine the proportions which the several cities and towns are to pay as provided in the Statute.

ant of violating the Statute prohibiting gift enterprises. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Robinson, McSherry, Briscoe and Fowler, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin Kurts, for appellant:

The making of gifts, as an inducement to the sale of goods, by a scheme or device not contrary to the Lottery Law, is a harmless act, and cannot be made an offense by legislation.

Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 87 Ill. 37, 40.

If the distribution is a pure gift or bounty, and not in name or pretense merely, which is designed to evade the law—if it be entirely unsupported by any valuable consideration moving from the taker—there is nothing in this mode of conferring it which is in violation of the policy of any statute condemning lotteries or gaming.

In Singer v. State, 8 L. R. A. 551, 73 Md. 466, Judge Robinson uses this language: "As to the common and ordinary occupations of life, little or no legislation may be necessary," and the Act of 1886, chapter 489, is sustained, because decided to be a valid exercise of the police powers of the State to regulate the trade and business of a plumber, which required special study, training and experience. This reasoning can hardly apply to the Act assailed in this case.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, Calvin Long, was indicted in the Criminal Court of Baltimore City for violating the Act of Assembly of 1886, chapter 480, which has been codified as section 186, article 27, of the Code of Pub. Gen. Laws, and which reads as follows: "No person or body corporate shall be permitted, either directly or indirectly, by agent or otherwise, to barter, sell, trade, or to offer for barter, sale or trade, by any publication, or in any way, any wares, goods or merchandise of any description, in package or bulk, holding out as an inducement for any such barter, sale or trade, or the offer of the same, any scheme or device by way of gift enterprises of any kind or character whatsoever."

The indictment contained two counts, the first charging that the said Long unlawfully sold certain merchandise, holding out as an inducement for such sale a certain scheme and device, by way of gift enterprise; and the second that he kept a certain place or house for the purpose of selling lottery tickets. At the trial, the State abandoned the second count relating to the sale of lottery tickets and elected to stand upon the first count. The plaintiff in error then demurred to the indictment upon the ground that the Act of Assembly of 1886, chapter 480, codified as above mentioned, upon which the first count is based, is void. This demurrer was overruled, and having been duly tried and convicted, said Long appealed to this court from the rulings of the criminal court as to the admissibility of certain testimony. Long v. State (Md.) ante, p. 89. We approved the rulings of the lower court and remanded the case for further proceedings. A final judgment having been entered, a writ of error was sued out assigning a number of errors. All of them, however, present the same question, namely, whether the Act referred to is a valid exercise of legislative power.

This is the only question here presented. It was not before us on the former appeal, for we then assumed that the Act was valid. The legislation we are considering is one of a class of laws which have been enacted in almost all the States, in order, if possible, to prevent lotteries and gambling from entering into the ordinary transactions of life. We find many cases, some of them being referred to by the attorney-general in his brief, illustrating the necessity of such laws to restrain the introduction into mercantile transactions of lottery schemes and gambling devices like the one the plaintiff in error used in his business. We said on the former appeal that such a device had not even the merit of originality, and it undoubtedly violates the provisions of our Code prohibiting lotteries "and all devices and contrivances designed to evade" the said provisions. The ingenuity and fertility of invention which has been exercised in efforts to evade such laws would no doubt win success in legitimate lines of business.

It would unduly prolong this opinion to review the many cases referred to in the briefs. All of those relied upon by the State are cases in which there was an indictment under the laws prohibiting lotteries, and in which it was held the several devices or contrivances adopted involved chance. The case of People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889, 12 Cent. Rep. 616, is the one chiefly relied upon by the plaintiff in error. We will consider it presently. In Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424, the exigency of the case required the court to determine and define what is a lottery, and it laid down this definition: "Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is determined by lot or chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, what and how much he who pays the money is to have for it, that is a lottery." Worcester's definition is, "A game of hazard, in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining greater value." And the definition adopted by the State in this case is not materially different from the above—"Any scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or by which one on paying money to another obtains a token, which entitles him to receive a larger value or nothing, as some formula of chance may determine, is a lottery."

In one respect we think all these definitions are too narrow to cover some of the modern devices resorted to in order to evade the Lottery Laws, and that whether the consideration paid or given for the token or chance to win something generally called a prize consists of money or any other thing of value, makes no difference.

An examination of the many cases on this subject will show that it is very difficult, if not impossible, for the most ingenious and subtle mind to devise any scheme or plan, short of a gratuitous distribution of property, which has not been held by the courts of this country to be in violation of the Lottery or Gaming Laws in force in the various States of the Union.

In the case of Yellow Stone Kit v. State, 88 Ala. 196, 7 L. R. A. 599, the court uses this language: "If the distribution is a pure gift or bounty and not in name or pretense merely which is designed to evade the law—if it be entirely unsupported by any valuable consideration moving from the taker, there is nothing in this mode of conferring it violative of the policy of our statutes condemning lotteries or gaming." It is apparent, however, that the giving away of property without consideration, whether by lot or otherwise, is not in itself an evil, and certainly not such an evil as requires prohibition by law at the present day.

The case referred to—that of People v. Gilson, decided by the Court of Appeals of New York in 1888—arose upon the question of the validity of an Act of the Legislature of that State, which provided that "no person shall sell, exchange or dispose of any article of food, or offer or attempt to do so, upon any representation, advertisement, notice or inducement than anything other than what is specifically stated to be the subject of the sale or exchange is or is to be delivered or received as a gift, prize, premium or reward to the purchaser." It was held that, "by the provisions of this Act, a man owning articles of food which he wishes to sell or dispose of is limited in his powers of sale or disposition. A liberty to adopt or follow for a livelihood a lawful pursuit, and in a manner not injurious to the community, is certainly infringed, limited, perhaps weakened or destroyed, by such legislation."

"The law," says the New York court, "interferes with the free sale of food, for the condition is imposed that no one shall sell food, and at the same time, and as part of the transaction, give away any other thing."

These remarks apply with great force to our own Act, which prohibits, as we have seen, in connection with any sale of goods, wares or merchandise, "any scheme or device by way of gift enterprises of any kind or character whatsoever."

This broad and sweeping language would seem to include not only a lottery in which a valuable consideration is given for the chance to win a prize, but also a gratuitous distribution not involving the element of chance. The words "gift enterprise," so far as we have ascertained, have never been judicially defined.

The Century Dictionary gives the only definition of the words we have been able to discover, as follows: "A business, as the selling of books or works of art, the publication of a newspaper, etc., in which presents are given to purchasers as an inducement."

It was contended on the part of the State that the Act of 1886 comes within the legitimate exercise of the police power, and that "gift enterprise" is a species of lottery, because the distribution in all gift enterprises is dependent on some formula of chance. But we do not think the words "gift enterprise" necessarily imply a scheme involving chance. In so far as the object of an Act is to protect the morals and advance the welfare of the people by prohibiting every scheme and device bearing any semblance to lottery or gambling, it undoubtedly would be a valid exercise of power, and the citation of authorities is not necessary to sustain a proposition so well settled.

But the Act in question goes further, and in effect, as we construe it, declares as did the New York Statute, which was held invalid in the case referred to, that no person shall give away anything to a purchaser of goods, wares or merchandise, as an inducement to make the purchase.

Such regulation of trade is, in our opinion, not only unwise but unlawful, and unlawful because it is necessary neither for the benefit, safety nor welfare of the people, and which in its operation would be oppressive and burdensome. People v. Gilson, 109 N. Y. 889, 12 Cent. Rep. 616; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98; Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 87.

It must always be conceded, of course, that the State can, through its Legislature, by the legitimate exercise of its police powers, pass "laws and regulations necessary for the protection of the health, morals and safety of society" (Singer v. State, 72 Md. 466, 8 L. R. A. 551); yet such regulations must be reasonable, and "what are reasonable regulations, and what are subjects of the police power, must be necessarily judicial questions." Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 40.

It follows that the Act of 1886, chapter 480, by reason of its general terms, including as it does all gift enterprises, those involving the element of chance as well as those that do not, is invalid, so far as it relates to gift enterprises not involving chance, and that the judgment of the Criminal Court of Baltimore must be reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

D. CHAPLIN et al., Appls.,

v.

BROWN et al.

(....Iowa....)

1. An agreement by grocers not to buy any butter from the makers for two years if a firm shall open a butter store in the place is void for lack of consideration where such firm neither pays anything therefor nor buys any established plant, place of business or good will.

2. The agreement is void as tending to create a monopoly where all the grocers in a town agree to give up dealing in butter if a new firm shall establish a butter store in the place and pay as much for butter as dealers in neighboring towns would pay.

(June 1, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Buena Vista County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for defendants' breach of their agreement not to engage in the business of buying butter in a certain place, and to enjoin the further breach of such agreement. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. H. Chapman and C. A. Irwin for appellants.

Mr. T. D. Higgs for appellees.

Rothrock, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

It appears from the petition that in the month of March, 1890, the plaintiffs entered into a written agreement with the defendants and other parties. The following is a copy of said agreement:

"We, the undersigned grocermen of Storm Lake, finding the business of purchasing butter of farmers and handling the same very burdensome, and of material loss to us, and believing the same could be handled as advantageously by persons who would make butter buying and handling an exclusive business, and whereas, the firm of D. & E. Chaplin, through their agent, assures us of their ability to handle butter to the best advantage, and that they will engage in the business extensively in our town, we make a solemn engagement and pledge ourselves to each other and to the said firm of D. & E. Chaplin that we will buy no more butter or take no more in trade, except for our family use, and all butter so bought shall be delivered by the seller to the buyer's place of residence. This, however, shall not prevent any merchant from buying butter to retail from any regular butter buyer who buys all the butter he handles in this town for cash. It is further provided that the said firm of D. & E. Chaplin, in whose favor we abandon the business, shall open rooms conveniently located for buying butter; that they shall keep a man in attendance during all business days and hours in the year from as early in the morning and until as late in the evening as the season of the year and state of the weather might deem to require. They shall accept all the butter offered, and shall pay for the same as high price in cash, or by giving check against a suitable deposit in some bank in this town, as merchants or butter buyers in the Town of Newell, this county, are at the time paying in cash for a similar grade of butter, except in extreme cases, where they may be paying materially more than the markets will warrant. It is also provided that the said D. & E. Chaplin shall not direct their checks or persons taking the same to any particular store for payment. That they shall not buy in connection with any dry goods or grocery store. Whenever a majority of the merchants signing this article of agreement are convinced that the engagements herein entered into are not being complied with, or whenever they are dissatisfied with this arrangement or the manner in which it is being carried out, any merchant whose name is hereto appended may appoint a meeting by notifying each grocery firm in town of the time and place for the purpose of considering who may be guilty of a breach of faith in carrying out these engagements, or whether it is advisable to continue the same; and if, at such meeting, a majority of the subscribers hereto shall certify in writing that they think it advisable for the interest of the town to withdraw from this engagement, this contract shall become null and void. This engagement shall take effect and be in force from and after such time as when it shall have been subscribed to by each grocery house in this town, and when the firm of D. & E. Chaplin shall designate, provided they are then prepared to handle the butter, and shall continue two (2) years unless sooner dissolved, as herein provided. We also agree not to pay a higher price for eggs than shall be fixed by the said firm of D. & E. Chaplin, provided said firm shall fix as high price as eggs are at the time worth to ship. W. C. Kinne & Co. Fred. Scholler. Brown Bros. J. O. Douglas. W. A. Jones. Geo. E. Ford & Bro. W. Lowmsberry. Libby & Rae. D. & E. Chaplin."

It is averred in the petition that the plaintiffs, in pursuance of said written contract, came and located at Storm Lake, and engaged in the business of buying butter at that place, and were at the commencement of the suit still so engaged, and have made arrangements to continue the business for the said period of two years, and that they have thus far fully complied with said written agreement, but that the defendants, in violation thereof, have opened a butter store in said town, and have engaged in the business of buying butter generally, and have thereby interfered with plaintiffs' business, and alienated their trade to the extent of 5,000 pounds of butter, upon which plaintiffs would have realized a profit of three cents a pound, making in all $150 damages suffered by plaintiffs. Judgment is demanded for said sum, and an injunction is prayed restraining the defendants from continuing in said business.

Among the several grounds of objection to the granting of an injunction we regard two of them as material. They are as follows: "first, that the agreement in writing is void for want of consideration, as there is no money value inuring to the benefit of the defendants herein; and, second, that said contract by its terms is for the purpose of creating a monopoly in purchasing and selling butter at Storm Lake, and is therefore in restraint of trade, to the detriment of the producers and consumers of butter at that place and in that vicinity."

The history of the law upon the question of contracts in restraint of trade is an interesting subject of investigation. The books abound in cases upon the subject. Anciently all contracts were void which in any degree tended to the restraint of trade, even in a particular locality, and for a limited time. This ancient rule has been so far modified that, although agreements in general restraint of trade are invalid, because they deprive the public of the services of the citizen in the occupation or calling in which he is most useful to the community, and expose the people to the evils of monopoly, and prevent competition in trade, yet an agreement in partial restraint of trade will be upheld where the restriction does not go beyond some particular locality, is founded upon a sufficient consideration, and is limited as to time, place and person. It is accordingly everywhere now held that when one engaged in any business or occupation sells out his stock in trade and goodwill he may make a valid contract with the purchaser binding himself not to engage in the same business in the same place for a time named, and he may be enjoined and restrained from violating his contract. This is about as far as contracts in restraint of trade have been upheld by the courts in this country or in England. The general principles above announced will be found in all text-books upon contracts, and find support in many adjudged cases. We have not thought it necessary to set out or cite the cases. They will be found collected in 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 882, and 10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 948; 2 Parsons, Cont. p. 747.

Applying these rules to the contract under consideration, we are to inquire first whether there is a sufficient consideration for the promise of the defendants and the other parties who executed the instrument not to engage in dealing in butter at Storm Lake. It is very plain that there was no money paid to them as a consideration. The plaintiffs did not purchase any stock of butter which the defendants had on hand. They paid nothing for an established plant or place of doing business, nor for the good-will of any business. So far as appears, they went into the Town of Storm Lake, and proposed to go into the butter business if the other persons then engaged in that business would agree to quit that line of trade for two years. In all the search we have made for authority upon this branch of the controversy we have found no warrant in any precedent for holding that this is a sufficient consideration. There are cases which hold, and the law is well settled, that where a party proposes to expend money in erecting a manufactory or other plant which may be a public benefit, subscriptions in aid of the enterprise are valid obligations. But such contracts are widely different in principle from the agreement under consideration. Suppose the plaintiffs had made a proposition to the dry-goods merchants of Storm Lake that if they would all quit the business for two years, without any consideration being paid to them for so doing, the plaintiffs would establish a dry-goods store at that place, and the proposition had been accepted; it would be a marvelous decision if any court would hold that there was any consideration for such a contract.

2. But it appears to us that the decision of the district court is manifestly right upon the question that the agreement is against public policy. It plainly tends to monopolize the butter trade of Storm Lake, and destroy competition in that business. It is not necessary that the enforcement of the agreement would actually create a monopoly in order to render it invalid, and surely, where all the dealers in a commodity in a certain locality agree to quit the business, and the plaintiffs are installed as the only dealers in that line, the tendency is, for a time at least, to destroy competition, and leave the plaintiffs as the only dealers in that species of property in that locality. Such contracts cannot be enforced.

Affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Otsego Circuit in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. E. M. Harris, for appellant:

The plaintiffs' intestate was guilty of negligence which caused or contributed to the injury he received.

He was in a safe place, at a familiar station, in full rigor of life, in good health, of good judgment, with nothing to disturb his judgment, when he attempted to board this moving train.

The boarding a moving train is presumably a negligent act.

The deceased knew the train was in motion when he attempted to board it, and he took the risk of the attempt.

It cannot be said that a person of ordinary prudence and care, standing on the platform as described in the evidence, would have attempted to jump into the narrow space between the cars when there was no danger to be avoided if he remained on the platform, and no incentive to the act other than the invitation of the conductor, which he knew he was not required to obey, and with a full apprehension of the danger he was about to run.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon a previous occasion we reversed a judgment recovered by these plaintiffs, and ordered a new trial, upon the ground that the act of the deceased in attempting to board the moving train was reckless and dangerous, and contributed to the resulting injury. 112 N. Y. 371, 2 L. R. A. 882. As the case was then presented, the fact was established by the evidence for the plaintiffs that the speed of the train was from four to six miles an hour at the time the deceased jumped on, and, though it was substantially admitted that the attempt was negligence on his part, it was argued that the act was justified because requested or directed by the conductor of the train. That direction was in these words: "If you are going, jump on." But we held that that circumstance constituted no excuse for the dangerous act, inasmuch as it created no emergency calling for the immediate exercise of judgment in the choice between two dangers, and that it amounted to nothing more than a notification that the train would not stop or go slower. Upon this appeal the plaintiffs endeavor to sustain another judgment recovered against the Company upon the new trial. They say that the case, though "practically the same," differs from the previous case in a vital feature, namely, with respect to the speed of the train. Upon the new trial evidence was given by three witnesses that the speed of the train was between one and two miles an hour. Of these witnesses, two had previously testified to a speed of four to six miles an hour, and the other had not testified upon that subject. In view of the doubt justly resting upon the character and correctness of this evidence, we might very properly say that it was open to the court to take as the fact concerning the speed of the train the evidence given by the other witnesses in the case, for both parties, which placed it at about six miles an hour. But we shall, for the purposes of the case, assume that the evidence as now given left it a question of fact as to how fast the train was moving past the station. We will accept that rate of speed deemed by the plaintiffs as most favorable to their contention, and still we must hold that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a recovery on their case. The conclusion was irresistible from the facts that the conduct of the plaintiffs' intestate was negligent, and that his act contributed to his injuries and death. He was described as a quick, active man, thirty-six years of age, and in good health. He had lived several years in sight of the station, and had frequently taken the train there. On the morning in question, accompanied by a friend, he went to the station, and stood with him upon the freight platform of the station until the train came in sight. The deceased then descended the steps leading to the lower or passenger platform, and waited there, at a point some four or five feet away from the steps. The train slackened its motion, but did not stop, and, as the passenger-car approached, the conductor, standing at the forward end, said to them, "If you are going, jump on." The deceased made an effort to do so, but in some way, not exactly described, was caught and rolled between the moving train and the freight platform, near to which he was standing. Very probably, in the attempt to get upon the moving car, the deceased, not reckoning upon the nearness of the higher and projecting freight platform, struck against it, was thrown down, and was forced between it and the train. Upon the facts, in what respect was the defendant guilty of negligence, and how was it responsible for the injury which resulted to the deceased? That the train did not stop at a particular or at the usual place, and ran beyond the station, would not charge the defendant with negligence, in the sense that it thereby caused the unfortunate result complained of. The deceased was under no obligation to board the train. In fact, he had no especial right to be carried by it. He had no ticket; but, even if he had one, that would not have placed the Company under any contract to carry him upon that train. If its servants disregarded the time-table notice as to that station upon the morning in question, that fact did not entitle the deceased to disregard the usual prudential considerations which should govern human action, nor did it subject the defendant to a liability for the consequences of an attempt to get upon a train in motion. The invitation, request or command of the conductor, however his words may be regarded, in no respect compelled the deceased to leave the place of safety upon the platform or to change his position. He was a free agent, and had the opportunity of choice between staying where he was and complying with the conductor's request. He could have waited for the train to come to a full stop, or for another train. The question of his convenience or inconvenience is of no consequence, and cannot enter as an element of the case. If a person, when in a safe position and under no stress of circumstances, attempts to get upon a train moving past him, at no matter what rate of speed, while in such a proximity to a known and prominent obstruction, such as was this freight platform, as to render the consequences of a false or misstep possibly, if not certainly, serious, we think that but one inference and opinion can be entertained. The act would be hazardous, and however slight the chances of injury might have seemed to him, and whatever the motive or influence which induced the act, the individual would alone be responsible for the injury which might result to him. Sufficient responsibility is imposed upon these corporations in the operation of their roads already, without adding to it a further responsibility for the consequences of rash and unnecessary acts. The railroad and the trains upon it charge all persons, having anything to do with or about them, with the knowledge of possible dangers, and their presence imposes the duty of being vigilant and prudent, if responsibility for an occurring injury is to be escaped. It is unnecessary to refer to authorities bearing upon the question before us. That has been done by Judge Peckham in his opinion when this case was formerly before us. The only difference now is that the respondents claim the speed of the train as testified to was so very moderate as to take this case out of the effect of our previous decision, and to make it one for the jury to pass upon, with respect to the question of whether the act of the deceased was negligent. It is true that upon the previous appeal we laid stress upon the fact that the rate of speed was so rapid as to compel the judgment to pronounce it a reckless act to attempt to board the train. But we did not hold that, if a train was moving much more slowly, the attempt, under the circumstances disclosed here, might be warrantable, or would raise a question for the jury to consider. It was said that there may be cases in which an attempt to get on or off a moving train would not be regarded as negligence as matter of law; and so there may be, but this is not one of those cases, inasmuch as the deceased was under no coercion nor obligation, and had no especial right to be carried by that train. He was so placed that, while safe if he remained quiet and where he was bound to know, and must have known, that if he endeavored to get upon the moving train, and should fail to accomplish it upon the second, or should take a misstep, he incurred the risk of being thrown against the neighboring freight platform and injured. The case of a passenger who alights from a train moving past his destination, in compliance with the direction of a servant of the corporation, as in Filer v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 47, cannot be altogether likened to the present case. In such a case there may be a stress of circumstances, in the passenger being obliged to choose between being carried away from the place where his duties or ties compelled his presence, and of endeavoring to alight, upon the direction or suggestion of the railroad employé. The question then might very properly be left to the jury for them to pronounce upon the character of the act; but even then, as it was held in the Filer Case, if the cars were moving at such a rapid rate as to charge the person with knowledge of the danger in the attempt, the act would be reckless, and no recovery could be had. To alight from or to board a train in motion is a negligent and hazardous act, which can only be made to appear excusable when, in the situation of the person, he is under such a coercion of circumstances as to raise a fair question as to whether he was really in the free possession and use of his faculties and judgment. Solomon v. Manhattan R. Co. 103 N. Y. 487, 4 Cent. Rep. 775. Judge Andrews, in the case cited, held substantially as I have just stated. In his view there is less excuse in boarding a moving train than in alighting from it, and the distinction is obvious. The option, in the former case, is between an unnecessary and possibly dangerous act and the mere inconvenience of being left to take a later train.

These views lead to the conclusion that the judgment below should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

Earl, Finch and Peckham, JJ., concur.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

When this case was here on a former appeal (112 N. Y. 371, 2 L. R. A. 832), it was held that the plaintiffs' intestate was guilty of negligence contributing to his death, because he attempted to board the train when running by the station at the rate of at least six miles per hour. As the case was then presented, the testimony conclusively established the fact that at the time when the train was passing the platform on which the deceased stood, it was running at that rate of speed at least, if not even more. Now the case is here upon a very different state of facts. Upon the last trial, resulting in the judgment now under review, three witnesses called by the plaintiff testified that the train was running, at the time the deceased attempted to get on, at the rate of speed not to exceed from one to two miles per hour. One of these witnesses was the engineer who had charge of this very train when the accident happened, and another was the fireman. The defendant on the first trial gave no evidence in regard to the speed of the train, but on the last trial it called two witnesses who testified that it was six or seven miles per hour. There were some facts and circumstances proven, bearing on the question of speed, which could also have been considered by the jury, not the least important of which was the undisputed fact that, though the train was running upon a slippery track and a down grade, it was brought to a full stop within 100 feet of the point where the deceased attempted to get on. In this conflict of testimony the case went to the jury, and the verdict for the plaintiff must be taken by us as conclusively establishing the fact that the train was running at the rate of from one to two miles per hour. It is said that two of the plaintiffs' witnesses testified on the first trial to a greater rate of speed than upon the last trial. That, if true, was a circumstance for the consideration of the jury in determining what weight the testimony was entitled to, but it has no place in the consideration of this appeal. The only question that we have to deal with is whether the deceased, in attempting to board the train when going by the station platform at the rate of from one to two miles per hour, and having been invited by the conductor in charge of the train to "jump on," was guilty of negligence as matter of law. It was a regular station on defendant's road where its trains stopped, and where passengers got on and off. On this morning, however, it failed to stop. The plaintiffs' intestate was on the platform waiting for the train, which he intended to take as a passenger, and while so waiting for it to stop it proceeded slowly past the platform, and when the rear car, which was the only passenger car on the train, had nearly reached the point where he was, the conductor, not intending to stop, invited him to get on, and he attempted to do so, and was killed. It is not the province of this court to examine the evidence in order to form some theory as to the particular manner in which the deceased was killed. That was for the jury. We can only know from the findings below that the platform on which he stood was separated from the car into which he was invited by a space not more than six inches wide; that the iron railing on the part of the car through which he must pass was two feet and six inches wide; and the platform of the car which he attempted to reach was but two feet higher than the place where he stood. The attempt of a passenger to board a train going at a very low rate of speed in this manner, and under such circumstances, is not, in my opinion, such a reckless and dangerous act as to warrant any court in pronouncing it negligence per se. It is an act in regard to which reasonable and prudent men may differ, and therefore it is for the jury to determine its true character as a question of fact, under all the circumstances of the case. The true rule was stated by Peckham, J., in his opinion in this very case, on the former appeal, in this language: "There may undoubtedly be circumstances under which an attempt to get on or off a moving train would not be regarded as negligence, as a matter of law, and where the question of negligence, under all the circumstances of the case, should be submitted to the jury." If this rule cannot properly be applied to a case like this, where the train, upon the finding of the jury, was barely in motion, it cannot have any practical application to any case whatever. If it is correct to say that a passenger, in attempting to board a train moving at the rate of from one to two miles per hour, under the conditions and circumstances appearing in this case, is guilty of negligence as a matter of law, then the same result must follow in every case where the train is in motion at all. The act of alighting from a moving train is quite as dangerous as an attempt to board it while going at the same speed. The only difference is that there exists a stress of circumstances in the former case that does not exist in the latter. But the fact that there may be reasons for risking the danger in one case which do not exist in the other is not alone enough to change the question from one of fact to one of law. This court has held that a passenger who attempts to get off a slowly moving train by the invitation of a servant of the company is not, as a matter of law, guilty of negligence. Filer v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 47. In that case the danger of getting off was as great and even greater than would be an attempt to get on while the motion of the train was the same. The passenger could have remained in the train, and sufferred the inconvenience of being carried past her home, and in the case at bar the deceased could have waited for another train; but surely this difference in the circumstances cannot change what was held to be a question of fact in the former case into a question of law in this. The highest court in at least three of our sister States has passed upon this question and in each case it has been held to be one of fact.

In Johnson v. Westchester & P. R. Co., 70 Pa. 357, a passenger attempted to board a train moving at from three to four miles an hour. There was no invitation to enter the car. It was held that it was for the jury to say whether the danger of boarding the train when in motion was so apparent as to make it the duty of the passenger to desist from the attempt. Where the conductor failed to stop the train at the platform where passengers landed, and when the train was moving at from two to four miles an hour, he told a passenger to get off, who obeyed his direction, and was killed, it was held that this act was not in law negligence, but was a question for the jury. Lambeth v. North Carolina R. Co. 66 N. C. 494.

In another case a young, vigorous man stepped down from a moving train. He had a valise in one hand and a basket in the other. There was no direction from any servant of the company. In an action to recover for injuries received, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether he exercised due care. Cumberlaid Valle R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 58.

I think that the act of the deceased in attempting to board the train upon the invitation of the conductor, and under all the circumstances disclosed in this case, presented a question of fact for the jury, and not a question of law. The judgment in this case cannot be disturbed unless we are prepared to decide that the deceased was in law guilty of negligence in attempting to board the train in the manner and under the circumstances stated. The evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant is precisely the same now as when the case was here before. On that appeal Judge Peckham said: "It was the duty of the railroad company (having advertised so to do) to stop its trains at the station in question, and to give ample time to all persons desirous of getting on or leaving at that station to do so." And again, referring to the invitation of the conductor to get on the train, he said: "It may be assumed that this direction implied a notice to the deceased that the train would not stop at that station, and that unless he attempted to get on while the car was thus in motion he would be left at the station and compelled to take another and a later train. It may be assumed that in giving this direction and in failing to stop the train, the Company was chargeable with negligence." The point that the trial judge submitted nothing to the jury except the evidence as to whether the conductor did or did not invite the deceased to get on the train is utterly untenable. The jury were expressly charged to inquire upon the evidence whether the defendant failed to perform its duty to the deceased in not bringing the train to a stop, and, upon the question whether a safe opportunity was afforded to the defendant to get upon the train, they were to consider the evidence in regard to the invitation of the conductor. At the end of the charge the defendant's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that, in case they found that the conductor did not invite the deceased to get aboard the train, their verdict must be for the defendant, as that ended the case, and this request was allowed. This did not withdraw from the jury the evidence bearing upon the failure of the defendant to stop, or any other question previously submitted, but was, in effect, an instruction that, although the defendant failed in its duty to stop the train at the station, yet there could be no recovery unless the conductor invited the deceased to get on. If there was any error in this part of the charge it was in favor of the defendant, and cannot now be used for the purpose of reversing the judgment. The judgment should be affirmed.

NOTE.—Sale of liquor to minor.

The fact that an adult pays for the liquor drunk by himself and a companion who is known to be a minor does not relieve the seller from liability to indictment for selling to a minor. State v. Scoggins (N. C.) 10 L. R. A. 542, and note, 107 N. C. 959.

On a prosecution of a master for a sale of liquors to a minor, by his servant, evidence that the minor was often seen going into the bar-room, and that defendant himself attended upon him, is admissible, as tending to show that, if any such sale was actually made by the bar-tender, it was made with the defendant's consent. *Com. v. defendant for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors to a minor. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Martin & Worrill for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. A. Carson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

Blackley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment was under section 4540a of the Code, which reads as follows: "No person or persons, by himself or another, shall sell, or cause to be sold, or furnished, or permit any other person or persons, in his, her or their employ, to sell or furnish any minor or minors spirituous or intoxicating or malt liquors of any kind, without first obtaining written authority from the parent or guardian of such minor or minors, and such person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be punished as prescribed in section 4810 of the Code." This Statute is a police regulation, and has regard, not alone to the will and wishes of parents and guardians over the conduct of children, but chiefly to the wholesome restraint and discipline of minors as immature members of society. It relies upon parental discretion, and intends that that discretion shall be exercised by the parent or guardian, and not delegated to the child. It has no thought of empowering the parent to make the child the judge of its own needs for intoxicating liquors, without limitation as to time or quantity. On the contrary, the foundation principle of the law is that the minor's discretion is not to be trusted. Hence it requires a decision of the parent or guardian, evidenced by writing. A parental decision not founded on the circumstances of any particular occasion, but applicable alike to all occasions, and measuring the supply of liquors to be furnished by nothing but the desires and appetites of the child, is simply an effort to repeal the law pro tanto. To give it effect would be in direct conflict with the principle announced by this court, during the prevalence of slavery, in the case of Reinhardt v. State, 29

Ga. 529, in which it was held that the master's discretion to determine the quantity of spirituous liquors necessary for the health of a slave could not be delegated. Consistently with the policy of the law, there can be no general authority by the parent conferred upon anyone to furnish liquors at his own pleasure or the pleasure of the child. The parent must hold control of the supply, both as to time and quantity, and the written authority must be special, as contradistinguished from general. It must be applicable to one occasion only, and must be repeated separately for each subsequent occasion. Once acted on, it is exhausted, and is no more authority for subsequent supplies than if it had never existed. Parental license to run indefinitely would, if granted by a sufficient number of rash and inconsiderate fathers, enable one or more drinking saloons in large cities to flourish on the patronage of minors alone. We think such a license shows on its face an attempted evasion of the law. It treats the parent alone as interested in the conduct of the child, and ignores the wider and more important policy of the Statute, which is to rear good citizens and conserve the public order and general welfare of the State. If we are correct in what has been said, the instrument relied upon as a defense in this case was void upon its face. It was no authority for selling or furnishing, even in a single instance, for it had no limitation as to time or quantity, and was obviously intended as a general license rather than as a particular authority. It was an unlimited permit to drink whiskey and beer in the bar-room of which the defendant was one of the proprietors. We have not overlooked the case of Maschwitz v. State, 49 Ark. 170, but, notwithstanding our high respect for the court which decided it, we cannot accept it as a precedent. It refers to no authority, and to our minds its reasoning confounds the just distinction between police and civil liability. There was no error in excluding the evidence, nor in refusing to grant a new trial on other grounds.

Zane, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the evidence in this record that Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Company, by its cashier, drew a bill of exchange for the sum of $6.50 on C. B. Richards & Co., of New York, payable to the order of one J. S. Field; that the latter indorsed it to Brainard & Roberson, and that they assigned it to the plaintiff for the consideration of $500 in cash and $100 due on a real-estate transaction. It also appears that the draft had been raised to $600 before the assignment to the plaintiff. The plaintiff also assigned the bill; and when the forgery was discovered, and the maker refused to pay, the plaintiff refunded the $500 to his assignee, and brought this suit against the defendants to recover the amount so paid by him to the defendants. Upon the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for that amount and interest, and a motion for a new trial having been denied by the court, a judgment was by it entered upon the verdict. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, and insist that it was erroneous, because the evidence was insufficient to authorize the verdict, in the absence of proof of demand and notice.

This is not an action based upon the assignment. It is an action to recover the amount paid by the plaintiff to the defendants without any consideration and under a mistake. To permit them to retain such consideration would, in effect, give them so much of plaintiff's money, obtained under a mistake, and without any consideration to plaintiff, and without fault on his part. There is a conflict in the authorities as to the necessity of demand and notice when the indorser does not receive the consideration for the transfer of title, as when he is a mere accommodation indorser. The drawee of a bill is presumed to know the signature of the drawer, and he must determine as to its genuineness and refuse payment; if not, he pays at his peril. Not so, however, as to the other signatures on it, or the writing in the body of it. As to those and such writing he must use reasonable care to prevent being imposed upon; and so, as to the drawer, he is presumed to know his own signature, and to be able to determine whether the amount named in it has been raised, and the law requires him to give prompt notice to the drawee of such forgeries. Some cases hold that demand and notice should be averred and proven when the action is upon the assignment to recover back the consideration paid; but when the action is to recover on the ground of want of consideration and mistake they hold no such demand or notice necessary to be averred or proven. The law applicable to the facts of this case is stated, as we hold, in sections 669 a and b, Daniel, Neg. Inst.: "The indorser engages (1) that the bill or note will be accepted or paid, as the case may be, according to its purport; but this engagement is conditional upon due presentment or demand and notice; he also engages (2) that it is in every respect genuine; (3) that it is the valid instrument it purports to be; (4) that the ostensible parties are competent; (5) and that he has lawful title to it and the right to indorse it. And if it turns out that any of these engagements but that first named are not fulfilled, the indorser may be sued for a recovery of the original consideration which has failed, or be held liable as a party without proof of demand and notice. The doctrine of the text that in such cases the indorser is bound without demand or notice undoubtedly applies when he indorses with knowledge of the infirmity that renders the instrument void; and such knowledge is necessary to make him so liable, according to some authorities. But the better opinion is, we think, that he is at least bound to refund the consideration paid him upon the transfer if the instrument is void, for it is not then the thing which it purported to be, and which he impliedly represented it to be. If he be a mere accommodation indorser, receiving no part of the consideration, it has been cogently argued and has been held that he is not responsible for any alteration which may have avoided the instrument, unless there were due demand and notice. But the consideration paid the party accommodated is in such case attributable to him, and he would seem to us to stand as a surety, bound to refund it; and the rule exacting notice to hold an indorser liable seems to us to apply to cases in which he warrants payment at maturity, and not to those cases in which he passes an instrument affected by some vice, which renders it in fact not the bill or note it purports to be." Under the facts of this case we hold that an offer to return the bill or a demand and notice was not necessary to be averred and proven. We find no error in the record.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

BURLINGTON, CEDAR RAPIDS &
NORTHERN R. CO.

v.

Peter A. DEY et al., Appls.

(....Iowa....)

1. The power to establish joint "through rates" for connecting carriers is included within the power of the State to regulate rates of charges for transportation of freight by railroads.
2. A railroad company is not compelled to enter involuntarily into contract relations with other companies, by a statute requiring the adoption of joint rates, or in default thereof the fixing of such rates by railroad commissioners, as in the latter case the obligation of the company as to the rates is one imposed by law and not by contract.
3. Judicial notice will be taken of the course of business of railroad companies to transfer cars over more than one railroad without breaking bulk.
4. A statute requiring freight in carload lots to be transferred without unloading unless the unloading is done without charge, and that smaller quantities shall be transferred into the cars of the connecting carrier at cost, which shall be made a part of the joint rate, does not interfere with the constitutional guaranties for the protection of the rights and property of the carriers.
5. Special proceedings applicable to specified subject matter, and conformable to the rules requiring notice and the acquisition of jurisdiction, and which affect all persons alike whose property or rights come within the lawful scope of the proceedings, are prosecuted with "due process of law."

6. The provision of a statute that rates fixed by railroad commissioners shall be regarded as prima facie reasonable is within the power of the State as to prescribing rules of evidence in all proceedings under the laws of the State.
7. Permitting the recovery of attorneys' fees on recovery against a railroad company for violation of a statute regulating rates does not violate the constitutional provision as to equality.
8. A provision allowing attorneys' fees on recovery by the plaintiff for the violation by a railroad company of the statutory schedule of rates does not impose a "penalty for exercising the right of defense."
9. There is no uncertainty in a statute prescribing the penalty for unreasonable railroad charges and declaring that rates fixed by railroad commissioners as the maximum shall be prima facie reasonable, as the State is precluded from denying that the commissioners' rates are reasonable.
10. Penalties imposed upon railroad corporations for violation of statutes are not excessive if no greater than is necessary to enforce obedience to the statute, although they might appear excessive if imposed upon individuals.

When the reasonableness of rates is in question, charges on long through lines cannot offer just basis for comparison with local rates for relatively short distances. Crews v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 703.

In through rates on long hauls, but not always in local rates, the rate per ton per mile grows less in proportion to the greater distance; while the aggregate of the rate increases in proportion to such greater distance. Business Men's Assn. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. supra.

The Act to Regulate Commerce aids the rule making aggregate charge of transportation of freight less in proportion every hundred miles after the first. Farrar v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 784.

The right to make greater charges for a short than for a long haul depends upon peculiar circumstances and conditions of each case. Boston & A. R. Co. v. Boston & L. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 571. See Re Louisville & N. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 278.

Joint rates on long hauls usually are, and should be, proportionately lower than local rates on short hauls. Farrar v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. supra. See notes to Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Closser (Ind.) 9 L. R. A. 754; Pensacola & A. R. Co. v. State (Fla.) 8 L. R. A. 661; United States v. Tozer (Mo.) 2 L. R. A. 444.

Duty owed to the public.

The time and manner in which a railroad company will carry persons and property, and the price to be paid therefor, are subject to legislative regulation; but in the absence of such regulation it owes only such duties to the public as the common law or custom has established. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 667, 29 L. ed. 201.

A railroad company is prohibited from discriminating unreasonably in favor of or against another company seeking to do business on its road. But that does not necessarily imply that it must stop at the junction of one and interchange business, because it has established joint depot accommodations with another company at another place. Ibid.

Local traffic rates must be reasonable.

A railroad company is under special obligation to give reasonable rates for its local business; but there are many influences which may affect through rates while not bearing upon local rates at all, or, if at all, in less degree. Lippman v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 414. See, as bearing on this point, Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 754, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 438; Detroit Board of Trade v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 199, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 515; New Orleans Cotton Exch. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 289, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 375.

The doctrine that an estimated proportion of the through rate must not be less according to distance than the local rate from an intermediate point to another point named in the line covered by the through rate is untenable. Poughkeepsie Iron Co. v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 243, citing Detroit Board of Trade v. Grand Trunk railroad makes the rates thus fixed only prima facie evidence of their reasonableness, although not expressly limiting them to that effect where the only penalties are for charging unjust and unreasonable rates, and a former statute, which did not extend to joint rates, and of which this was an amendment, expressly limited the effect of the commissioners' order as to rates to prima facie evidence.

12. Where a statute is susceptible of conflicting and doubtful construction, that construction should be adopted which supports it in all its parts.
13. Courts must uphold a statute unless it is so plainly and palpably in conflict with the Constitution as to leave no doubt or hesitation in the judicial mind as to its invalidity.
14. Allegations of a petition for an injunction that the right and liberty of contracting with reference to its business is denied to the petitioner, and that its property is therefore taken from it without its consent, and that it is compelled to enter into involuntary, unreasonable and unprofitable contracts, do not amount to allegations of facts, but to mere statements of conclusions, and are not therefore admitted by a motion to dissolve the injunction.
15. The rule that the dissolving of an injunction is discretionary, and that the refusal of the court below to dissolve it will not be disturbed unless the discretion is abused, does not apply to cases involving questions of law arising upon the face of the pleadings.
16. An injunction may be dissolved on motion, although the facts alleged in the petition are not denied, if the issues involved simply the validity of statutes which, if valid, will render the injunction improper notwithstanding the allegations of fact.

An intermediate local rate should never exceed a through rate to the terminus of the line, plus the local rate back to the intermediate point. Martin v. Southern Pac. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 1.

In absence of competition from Canadian railways, conditions of traffic from San Francisco to Denver are not so different from those from San Francisco to the Missouri River as to justify the greater charge for the shorter distance. Ibid.

Through traffic arrangements.

Neither at common law nor under the Act of Congress of June 15, 1866 (U. S. Bev. Stat. § 5368), or the Interstate Commerce Act of Feb. 4, 1887, can a common carrier be compelled to make through traffic arrangement with connecting lines. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 289, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 351, 87 Fed. Rep. 587.

The Act to Regulate Commerce does not empower the commission to compel railroad companies to enter into joint arrangements with carriers by water for through carriage at through rates. Re Joint Water & Rail Lines, 2 Intern. APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County overruling their motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction restraining them, in their capacity as railroad commissioners, from establishing and promulgating joint rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars over plaintiff's railroad and the roads connected with it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Y. Stone, Atty-Gen., for appellants.

Messrs. S. K. Tracy, John C. Bills, A. E. Swisher, T. S. Wright and J. W. Blythe for appellee.

Beck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. In view of the facts that the motion to dissolve the injunction operates as a demurrer to the petition, and the decision thereon is for review in this case, it becomes necessary to set out fully the pleadings upon which the decision was made. They are as follows:

"Petition in Equity. Your petitioner, the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern Railway Company of Iowa, a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of Iowa, complains, and says: That defendants, Peter A. Dey, Spencer Smith and

Where several rail carriers engaged in interstate commerce each cross or touch a navigable river, leaving a large space of territory along and near the river and between their lines that can be served only by steamboats, they may make through rates with only one line of steamboats, and refuse to make such through rates with other steamboats, on the river; and this is not unjust discrimination or unlawful preference. Capehart v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra.

Through rates, legality of.

Through rates are not necessarily illegal, which, when divided between carriers, give them less than their local rates, provided the through rate itself is not less than some one of the locals, or unjustly discriminating against individuals or localities, or so low as to burden other business with part of the cost of the business upon which it is imposed. Lippman v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 414.

Such a situation only becomes illegal when it can be shown that illegal results follow from it. La Crosse Mfrs. & Jobbers Union v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 9, 1 Intern. Com. Com. Rep. 29; Business Men's Assn. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 41, 2 Intern. Com. Com. Rep. 52.

A rate is none the less a through rate when freight is shipped upon a through bill of lading from the point of origin to destination, accompanied by a way-bill showing the route over which it is to pass, with the percentages of all the other lines set forth, because the initial carrier charges its local rate as part of the total rate, and the remaining lines charge an agreed rate made by percentages. Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 393.

F. T. Campbell compose the board of railroad commissioners of the State of Iowa. That under and by virtue of chapter 28 of the Acts of the 22d General Assembly authority is given to said board to fix, establish and publish reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight upon railroads within said State. That a schedule of rates has been adopted by said board for petitioner, which was by it duly accepted and adopted as reasonable and just. Your petitioner would now further show that by the Act of the 23d General Assembly entitled 'An Act to Amend Chapter 28 of the Acts of the 22d General Assembly, Giving Authority for the Making of Rates for Transportation of Freight and Cars over Two or More Lines of Railroad within this State, and Enlarging the Powers and further Defining the Duties of the Board of Railroad Commissioners,' a copy of which Act is attached hereto and made part hereof, it is provided that all railway companies doing business in this State, upon the demand of any person, shall establish joint rates for the transportation of freight between points on their respective lines, and shall receive and transport freight and cars over such routes as the shipper shall direct. It is further provided by said chapter 28 of the Acts of the 22d General Assembly that, when the rates for transportation charges are fixed by the board of railroad commissioners, such rates shall, in all suits brought against any railroad company, wherein are in any way involved the charges of such railroad for the transportation of freight, be deemed and taken in all courts of this State as prima facie evidence that the rate thus fixed is a reasonable and just charge for the transportation of freight and cars upon such roads, and that any greater charge shall be deemed extortion. And it is further provided in said chapter 28 of the Acts of the 22d General Assembly that, for violating the charges or rates thus fixed by the board, the penalty therefor is to forfeit and pay to the State of Iowa not less than one thousand ($1,000) dollars nor more than five thousand ($5,000) dollars for the first offense, and not less than five thousand ($5,000) dollars nor more than ten thousand ($10,000) dollars for every subsequent offense, to be recovered in a civil action, by ordinary proceedings, in the name of the State of Iowa. Your petitioner would now further inform your honor that several demands have been sent to it under the last Act, or Joint Rate Law, demanding that it shall make joint rates with other railroads, as is in said Act contemplated. That your petitioner has refused to make such joint rates upon such requests, and still does refuse to make such joint rates with other and distinct railroads. That by said last Act of the Legislature (known as the 'Joint Rate Act') it then becomes the duty of the board of railroad commissioners, upon such refusal, and upon application of any person, to establish joint rates between different and connecting roads. That said board has been so requested by interested parties to establish joint rates between petitioner and other railroads, and is about to so do and promulgate the same, and such joint rates will be established and promulgated, unless restrained by order of this court; thus subjecting your petitioner to the heavy penalties referred to in the event of non-complying with the joint rates thus to be established and promulgated. Your petitioner now avers that the

A through rate does not unjustly discriminate against an intermediate point because less proportionally than the rate from such point to the common destination. Ibid.

Contracts for through rates on railroads.

Contracts with other companies for the establishment of through routes and through rates for the continuous carriage of interstate traffic do not violate § 7 of the Act to Regulate Commerce, prohibiting a combination to prevent the carriage of freights from being continuous. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 220, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 351, 37 Fed. Rep. 557.

The fact that a railroad company makes such arrangement for one of its branch roads will not charge it with unjust discrimination for refusing to make identical arrangements on other parts of its system. Re Joint Water & Rail Lines, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 436.

Connection with bridge company.

A bridge company which is not, either in law or in fact, a common carrier of interstate traffic, cannot invoke the provisions of the Act to Regulate Commerce to compel railway companies to transact business with or through such bridge company. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 220, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 351, 37 Fed. Rep. 557.

Its franchise does not constitute it a common carrier, nor confer on it authority "to equip its road, and to transport goods and passengers thereon, and charge compensation therefor." Ibid.

Where a railroad company, by contract with a bridge company, acquires the right to use a bridge, with its approaches, for its engines, cars and trains, 12 L. R. A.

it is regarded, under the Act to Regulate Commerce, § 1, as the owner or operator of the bridge and approaches, for the time being, as to all freight transported by it over the bridge. Ibid.

On through contract initial company bound to perform.

A railroad company whose line extends from Atlanta to West Point, Georgia, having received at Atlanta goods for shipment, consigned to Dallas, Texas, and having fixed by contract with the consignor the rate of freight for the whole distance, apportioning a part of the same among the carriers, itself included, is bound for performance to the place of consignment. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Texas Grate Co. 81 Ga. 302. See Falvey v. Georgia R. 76 Ga. 597.

Through export rates.

The only practicable mode yet devised for making through export rates, as appears by past experience, is to add to the established inland rates from the interior to the seaboard the current ocean rates. New York Produce Exch. v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 552.

Refusal to furnish coal cars; unjust discrimination.

A New York railroad extending to Dayton, Ohio, by agreement being considered with an Ohio railroad extending from Dayton to Cincinnati, an initial road at Cincinnati, with right to make rates to that place, Cincinnati must be treated as a point upon the line for the purpose of proceeding against the company for unjust discrimination in refusing to furnish coal cars. Riddle v. New York, L. E. W. R. Co. 1 Intern. Com. Rep. 757.

Act of the Legislature of Iowa known as the 'Joint Rate Bill,' a copy of which is attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' is unconstitutional and void, and said commissioners have no right or authority thereunder to fix a joint rate, or promulgate the same. That said Act deprives your petitioner of its rights guaranteed by section 9, art. 1, of the Constitution of Iowa, in that it deprives your petitioner of its property, and the right to contract, and deprives it of liberty, without due process of law, and prevents its acquiring, possessing and protecting its property as guaranteed by section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of Iowa, and by like powers of the Constitution of the United States. That if defendants are allowed and permitted to establish and promulgate such joint rates, although the same will be void for the reasons stated, yet thereunder your petitioner will be subjected to a multiplicity of suits, by many different persons, to recover the penalties referred to, and otherwise harassed by vexatious litigation. To the end, therefore, that your petitioner may obtain the relief to which it is justly entitled in the premises, and being remediless at law, it now prays the court to grant it a temporary writ of injunction, restraining defendants and each of them, and as the board of railroad commissioners, from establishing and promulgating joint rates with it in connection with other railroads, for the shipment of freight and cars over such different railroads, and that upon a final hearing it be ordered and decreed that defendants be permanently enjoined from establishing such joint rates. And further, your petitioner prays for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable."

(EXHIBIT A.)

"An Act to amend chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly, giving authority for the making of rates for the transportation of freight and cars over two or more lines of railroad within this State, and enlarging the powers and further defining the duties of the board of railroad commissioners. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa:

"Section 1. That chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: That said chapter 28 of the Twenty-Second General Assembly shall not be construed to prohibit the making of rates by two or more railroad companies for the transportation of property over two or more of their respective lines of railroad within this State, and a less charge by each of said railroad companies for its portion of such joint shipment than it charges for a shipment for the same distance wholly over its own line within the State shall not be considered a violation of said chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly, and shall not render such Railroad Company liable to any of the penalties of said Act. But the provision of this section shall not be construed to permit railway companies establishing joint rates to make, by such joint rates, any unjust discrimination between the different shipping points or stations upon the respective lines between which joint rates are established. Any such unjust discrimination shall be punished in the manner and by the same penalties provided in chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly.

"Sec. 2. All railway companies doing business in this State shall, upon the demand of any person or persons interested, establish reasonable joint through rates for the transportation of freight between points on their respective lines within this State, and shall receive and transport freight and cars over such route or routes as the shipper shall direct. Carload lots shall be transferred without unloading from the cars in which such shipments were first made, unless such unloading in other cars shall be done without charge therefor to the shipper or receiver of such carload lots, and such transfer be made without unreasonable delay; and less than carload lots shall be transferred into the connecting railway's cars at cost, which shall be included in and made a part of the joint rate adopted by such railway companies, or established as provided by this Act. When shipments of freight to be transported between different points within this State are required to be carried by two or more railway companies operating connecting lines, such railway companies shall transport the same at reasonable through rates, and shall at all times give the same facilities and accommodation to local or state traffic as they give to interstate traffic over their lines of road.

"Sec. 3. In the event that said railway companies fail to establish through joint rates, or fail to establish and charge reasonable rates for such through shipments, it shall be the duty of the board of railroad commissioners, and they are hereby directed, upon the application of any person or persons interested, to establish joint rates for the shipment of freight and cars over the two or more connecting lines of railroad in this State; and in the making of such rates, and in changing or revising the same, they shall be governed, as near as may be, by all the provisions of chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly, and shall take into consideration the average of rates charged by said railway companies for shipment within this State for like distances over their respective lines, and rates charged by the railway companies operating such connecting lines for joint interstate shipments for like distances. The rates established by the board of railroad commissioners shall go into effect within ten days after the same are promulgated by said board, and from and after that time the schedule of such rates shall be prima facie evidence in all of the courts of this State of the joint transportation of freight and cars upon the railroads for which such schedules have been fixed.

"Sec. 4. Before the promulgation of such rates, as provided in section 3 of this Act, the board of railroad commissioners shall notify the railroad companies interested in the schedule of joint rates fixed by them, and they shall give said railroad companies a reasonable time thereafter to agree upon a division of the charges provided for in such schedule; and, in the event of the failure of said railroad companies to agree upon such a division, and to notify the board of such agreement, the board of railroad commissioners shall, after a hearing of the companies interested, decide the same, taking into consideration the value of terminal facilities, and all the circumstances of the haul; and the division so determined by the board shall, in all controversies of suits between railroad companies interested, be prima facie evidence of a just and reasonable division of such charges.

"Sec. 5. Every unjust and unreasonable charge for the transportation of freight and cars over two or more railroads in this State is hereby prohibited, and declared to be unlawful, and each and every one of the companies making such unreasonable and unlawful charges, or otherwise violating the provisions of this Act, shall be punished as provided in chapter 28 of the Acts of the Twenty-Second General Assembly for the making of unreasonable charges for the transportation of freight and cars over a single line of railroad by a single railroad company.

"Sec. 6. This Act, being deemed of immediate importance, shall take effect and be in force from and after its publication in the Iowa State Register and the Des Moines Leader, newspapers published in the City of Des Moines, Iowa."

Upon the presentation of the motion to dissolve the injunction, plaintiff filed the following: "Amendment to the Petition. Your petitioner, by way of amendment to the original bill filed in this cause, further avers: First. That said Act known and referred to as the 'Joint Rate Bill,' and the Act of which it is amendatory, are unconstitutional and void, in this: that under said Acts your petitioner is denied the right of a jury trial, and denied due process of law, in the protection and preservation of its property, as guaranteed by the ninth section of article 1 of the Constitution of the State of Iowa; that its property, or the use thereof, is taken without its consent, and without just compensation, for private and public purposes, and that its right of appeal is so tampered with as to make that right ineffectual; that in the enforcement of any order promulgated by said railroad commissioners all distinction between law and equitable actions is abolished by said Acts, all of which is in direct violation of the 8th section of article 5 of the Constitution of the State of Iowa, and which deprives petitioner of that due process of law therein guaranteed. Second. That said Acts are violative of section 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, in that it is a regulation of commerce among the several States. Third. That said Acts are void and unconstitutional, because they violate section 17 of article 1 of the Constitution of Iowa, by imposing excessive fines and unusual punishment. Fourth. That said Acts are void and inoperative, because they fail to describe or define the offenses for which the extraordinary penalties are imposed, and impose penalties, by way of attorney's fees, upon railroad companies for making any defense to actions brought under said Acts. Fifth. That said Joint Rate Act is violative of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it abridges the privileges or immunities of your petitioner as a citizen, denies it equal protection of the laws and deprives it of its property, and the use thereof, without just compensation or due process of law; that by said Acts your petitioner is denied the right and liberty of contracting with reference to its business, and thus is its property taken from it without its consent, and it is compelled to enter into involuntary, unreasonable and unprofitable contracts with other railroad companies, at the instance of third parties, compelling the operation of its road at a loss; that, in the matter of fixing the joint rates contemplated in said Statute, your petitioner is not notified of the time or place when the same are to be fixed by defendants, nor given any opportunity to object to the making of such rates, or to show the unreasonableness of the same; that, under said Statute, the joint rates, as thus fixed by defendants, are final and absolute, and thus is your petitioner deprived of its property, and the use thereof, without due process of law, and deprived of making reasonable and lawful contracts and profits as other citizens are permitted to do, and hence it is denied that equal protection of the law guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. Wherefore your petitioner prays that the temporary writ of injunction issued herein may be continued until the final hearing of this cause, and that upon such final hearing said injunction may be made perpetual; and your petitioner prays for such other and further relief as may be deemed equitable in the premises."

The motion to dissolve the injunction is based upon the ground that the Statutes assailed are in harmony with the Constitution; that the petition does not show that plaintiff is entitled to the relief prayed for in the petition and that the district court has no jurisdiction in the cause for the reason that it is, in fact, an action against the State, and it is not shown that the State had authorized or consented to the bringing of the suit. Chapter 28, Acts 22d Gen. Assem., which is amended by chapter 17, Acts 28d Gen. Assem., contains many sections. They need not be set out, except such as are brought in question or assailed in the argument of counsel. They will be cited or quoted in the discussions of the questions raised thereon.

2. The original Act, authorizing rates of charges to be fixed by the railroad commissioners (chap. 28, Acts 22d Gen. Assem.) contains this provision: "Sec. 17. The board of railroad commissioners of this State are hereby empowered and directed to make, for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this State, as soon as practicable, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars on each of said railroads, and said power to make schedules shall include the power of classification of all such freights; and it shall be the duty of said commissioners to make such classifications: provided, that the said rates of charges to be so fixed by said commissioners shall not, in any case, exceed the rates which are or may hereafter be established by law; and said schedules so made by said commissioners shall, in all suits brought against any such railroad corporations, wherein is in any way involved the charges of any such railroad corporation for the transportation of any freight or cars, or unjust discrimination in relation thereto, be deemed and taken in all courts of this State as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable and just maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars upon the railroads for which said schedules may have been respectively prepared. Said commissioners shall, from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules, subject to the same provision that the rates fixed are not to be higher than now or hereafter established by law. When any schedule shall have been made or revised as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause notice thereof to be published for two successive weeks in some public newspaper published in the City of Des Moines, in this State, which notice shall state the date of the taking effect of said schedule, and said schedule shall take effect at the time so stated in such notice, and a printed copy of said revised schedule shall be conspicuously posted by such common carrier in each freight office and passenger depot upon its line or lines. All such schedules, so made, shall be received and held in all such suits as prima facie the schedule of said commissioners, without further proof than the production of the schedule desired to be used as evidence, with a certificate of said railroad commissioners that the same is a true copy of the schedule prepared by them for the railroad company or corporation therein named, and that notice of making the same has been published as required by law: provided that, before finally fixing and deciding what the original maximum rates and classification shall be, it shall be the duty of the railroad commissioners to publish ten days' notice in two daily papers published in Des Moines, setting forth in such notice that, at a certain time and place, they will proceed to fix and determine such maximum rates and classification; and they shall at such time and place, and as soon as practicable, afford to any person, firm, corporation or common carrier who may desire it, an opportunity to make an explanation or showing, or to furnish information to said commissioners, on the subject of determining and fixing such maximum rates and classification; and, in any event, the original schedule of rates and classification of freights, on all lines of railroads in Iowa, shall be fixed and shall go into effect within sixty days from the taking effect of this Act."

It will be observed, upon consideration of the plaintiff's petition, that the threatened injury which it seeks to avert by the injunction in this case is the establishing, promulgating and enforcing what in the petition are called "joint rates between petitioner and other railroads." It is important that we determine, at the door of this discussion, what are these "joint rates" the fear of which is the ground of plaintiff's action. The Statute above quoted (sec. 2) provides that "all railroad companies doing business in this State shall, upon demand of any person or persons interested, establish reasonable joint through rates for the transportation of freight between points upon their respective lines within the State." Section 3 provides that, "in the event said railway companies fail to establish through joint rates, or fail to establish reasonable rates for such through shipments, it shall be the duty of the board of railroad commissioners, and they are hereby directed, upon application of any person or persons interested, to establish joint rates for the shipment of freight and cars over two or more lines of railroads in this State." This Statute requires the railroad companies to establish "through joint rates," and in default thereof the railroad commissioners are directed to establish such rates. It is plain that the rates required are joint rates of charges for the transportation of freight and cars. See sec. 17, chap. 28, Acts 22d Gen. Assem., above quoted. And it is equally plain that the joint rates of charges cover all the charges for the transportation over two or more roads, as though they constituted one road, the rate fixed determining the whole charges. It is also plain that these joint rates consist of the separate rates of each separate road. As their services in the transportation of the freight or cars are not always equal, because of differences in the distances of transportation and for other reasons, the reasonable charges which each ought to make cannot be equal. It will be seen at once that the railroad companies, or the railroad commissioners, when establishing joint through rates, must establish a rate for each road which, when united, will be "the joint through rates." This is an obvious construction of the Statute demanded by its language, "through joint rates" (plural) which the railroad companies and the railroad commissioners are required to establish.

3. The establishing of "through joint rates" is the only duty to be exercised in the discharge of the power conferred upon the railroad commissioners by the sections of the Statute just cited, which are the occasion of plaintiff's fears of interference with its rights, whereon this action is founded. The plaintiff does not allege any other ground of action than the threatened establishing of "through joint rates." No other objections to the Statutes in question, pertaining to railroads and rates and joint rates, are made in the petition; none other are before us for consideration. It will be here seen that the Statutes under consideration in no way affect the duty, obligation or rights of the plaintiff as a common carrier, further than is done by the regulation of rates of charges. The law relating to the receipts and delivery of freight to connecting lines, and the obligations and rights of consignors and consignees and of the railroads, growing out of the relations arising when such connecting lines exist, are not modified, restricted nor in any way affected by these Statutes. In short, the duty of the railroad companies, as to rates and joint rates, is alone affected and regulated by these Statutes. These conclusions will be again brought to mind in the further consideration of the case.

4. The considerations just expressed lead to the conclusion that the power and authority vested in the State, under which rates of charges for the transportation of freight by railroads are regulated, may be exercised to establish what are called "joint through rates." That the State may fix the maximum charges for the transportation of freight by railroads, which shall not be unreasonable, is not disputed in this case. It has been so decided by the United States Supreme Court, and the doctrine has been recognized by this court. See Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94. In our opinion, no facts or distinction in principle exist which deprive the State of authority and power to establish "joint through rates," while it may, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, fix rates of freight charges for each separate railroad. When rates, not joint, are fixed, the maximum charges for specified distances, or per mile, are determined for each separate railroad, as shown by this illustration: Freight is shipped from Cedar Rapids to Davenport by the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroads. The rate of freight charges is fixed by the State from Cedar Rapids to West Liberty, and a separate rate from West Liberty to Davenport. Now, here are two separate rates,—a rate for each road. It is not doubted that the State may fix these rates; and when that is done the charges for through shipments from Cedar Rapids to Davenport is the sum of the separate rates. The State, in the exercise of its authority, in accord with legislative wisdom, may discover that these separate rates, when united, are too small to compensate the carrier, or too large to do justice to the shipper; that justice demands such modification of these separate charges that the sum thereof will be reasonable and just, both as to the railroad companies and the shippers. Thereupon the State, for "through shipments" over the two roads, fixes rates of charges for each road. The sum thereof, united, constitutes the lawful charge for freight between Cedar Rapids and Davenport. It clearly appears that the thing done in the one case is the same as in the other. It is simply the fixing of the rate to be charged by each road. No reason can be given why the State should not fix separate rates, which should apply to the through shipments between stations of different roads. The authority which will authorize the fixing of rates for each road may be exercised, when there shall be through shipments over separate roads, to enlarge or restrict such separate rates, in order to attain the ends of justice. It will clearly be seen that the words "through joint rates" simply mean rates which shall be just and reasonable charges for the transportation over the united route. As we have said, these united charges must be so apportioned to the separate roads that each shall receive a just and reasonable part of the joint charge. If the joint rate is fixed by the railroad companies, they will determine the part each shall receive. This will be done by the railroad commissioners, in case the railroad companies fail to fix joint rates; and the commissioners will consider matters and circumstances which should affect the division. Acts 23d Gen. Assem. chap. 17, § 4.

5. The arranging of what is called "joint through rates" is not a thing that is new in the business of railroad transportation. The current history of the country discloses the existence of the practice among railroads to make through shipments of freight without change of cars. Nor is this practice of recent origin. It has existed whenever the business of the roads demanded it. Expedition and economy in transportation induced contracts and arrangements for through shipments between points on connecting roads. It may be that in some cases the managers of the roads refused or failed to enter into such arrangements or contracts, and it may be that in other cases the business of the roads has not been managed wholly in accord with the best interests of the corporations owning them, and with the requirements of the law. But such failure of duty does not establish the right to be exempt therefrom. Surely, the course of business which has been found, by experience of railroad management, to be promotive of economical transportation and increase of business, thereby promoting the interest of the owners of the railroads and the shippers, ought to be pursued; and, if the railroad management fail or refuse to pursue it, the State, as it has done in the Statutes under consideration, ought to require it to be pursued. This the State can do under the authority it possesses to regulate and control carriers, and provide maximum freight charges.

It will be observed that section 3 of the Statute above quoted, providing for joint through rates, contemplates the practice of through shipments, so long existing, and requires the railroad commissioners to consider the charges made for joint interstate shipments and the rates charged by the railroad companies for shipments within the State. The purpose of the Statute is to secure just and reasonable rates for the shippers of this State, and it directs that the practice and course of business of the railroads shall be considered in fixing such rates. It cannot be that the Statute in question will operate to the denial of just compensation to the railroad corporations for the transportation of property. It provides that joint rates fixed under the Statutes shall be reasonable. The railroad commissioners, it will be presumed, will rightly discharge their duties, and will fix reasonable and just "joint through rates." If these officers fail in their duty, from errors of judgment or from other causes, the railroads may cause their action to be reviewed and corrected.

6. Objections to the Statutes are urged in the following language: "We contend, therefore, that the law seeks to compel: first, that two or more companies shall enter involuntarily into contract relations with each other at the demand of a third person; second, that one company shall surrender its cars to the possession of another, or unload the contents without compensation; third, that, at the demand of a third person, companies shall not only part with the possession of their cars, with no provision in the law as to their return or compensation for their use, but shall accept cars of other companies, and carry the same over its lines, without any provision for compensation." The statement of facts in this position is not wholly correct. It is not correct that railroad companies are, under the Statute, compelled to enter involuntarily into contract relations with each other. It is true that the Statute requires them to enter into the contract for joint rates, thus imposing upon them the duty so to do; but the Statute does not provide for enforcing the duty by proceedings recognizing a contract between the parties, if that, indeed, could be done; nor does it provide for penalties or forfeitures for failure to discharge the duty. It simply provides that, in case of failure to adopt joint rates by the companies, the railroad commissioners shall prescribe them, and the companies shall not be permitted to charge more. In that case, the charges are not made by the companies under a contract, but pursuant to a duty and obligation imposed by law. It is not necessary, in order to support an action against a railroad company for failure to fix joint rates, to hold that it is bound by an obligation as of a contract. Its liability arises by reason of its failure to perform a duty imposed by law. The Statute, in its principle and its effect in this regard, is not different from other rules of the law applicable to common carriers, which hold them liable for failure to receive property for transportation. In both cases the carrier is liable for the non-performance of duty.

7. The course of business of railroad companies, originating in the wants and demands of commerce, requires the cars of one company to be delivered to another for transportation. It is presumed that rules relating to compensation for the cars transported are settled by agreement, or under rules recognized and prevailing in the business of transportation by railroads. At all events, the law provides rules under which this matter of compensation may be settled. It is competent for the railroad commissioners, if it be necessary, to impose rules touching this matter, in order to aid the railroad companies to perform the duty imposed by the Statute to provide for joint rates, or to require or enforce the performance of that duty. The fact that the transfer of cars from one company to another, for the transportation of property over more than one railroad, without breaking bulk, has been practiced so long as to be recognized as of the course of business, of which we will take judicial notice (Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 109 Ill. 185), is a complete answer to the complaints made in the objections under consideration. Surely, a course of business so long pursued, and so extensively prevailing, and demanded by the commerce of this country, cannot, when recognized and required by statute, become so objectionable in principle, so oppressive in operation, as to require the Statute to be declared unconstitutional. A railroad company, as a common carrier, is required to receive and transport freight offered to it for transportation. The reasons upon which this rule is founded impose upon it the obligation to haul cars of other companies brought to it for the transportation over its own road. Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. supra.

As the course of business of the railroad companies and the rules of law require them to transport the cars of other companies, surely a statute prescribing and enforcing the duty thus imposed cannot be regarded as interfering with the constitutional guaranties for the protection of the rights and property of such companies. The Statute under consideration provides that freight in carload quantities may be transferred, instead of going through to destination without change of cars, the cost of unloading being paid by the company making it. Acts 23d Gen. Assem. chap. 17, § 2. This provision is intended to excuse the duty to transfer cars upon payment of costs of unloading, and is enacted in the exercise of legislative authority, to regulate the performance of duty by carriers, and prescribe reasonable charges for the transportation of freight.

8. Counsel for plaintiff maintain, upon many grounds, that the Statutes in question are in conflict with both the State and Federal Constitutions. It is first urged that they impair the obligation of the contract arising under plaintiff's charter. It has been held by the United States Supreme Court that railroad corporations are "subject to legislative control as to the rates of fare and freight, unless protected by their charters." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94. This doctrine is recognized by this court. The authority of the State to control rates of freight charges made by railroad companies is not restricted so that it cannot be exercised in fixing the rates to be charged by connecting roads, which are called in the Statute "joint through rates." Joint rates, as explained heretofore in this opinion, are simply the sum of separate rates of the respective roads. The railroad commissioners in fixing joint rates, under authority of the State, may make just and reasonable orders for the return of cars and for compensation for their use, or for hauling them, and they will consider these matters in fixing the separate rates which together make the joint rate. The constitutional objection in this point demands no further consideration.

9. It is urged by plaintiff's counsel that the Statute is in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, "in that, without due process of law, and without just compensation, it takes away from the corporations funds invested by them upon certain specified trusts, and applies these funds to uses to which the owners never consented." We understand this objection, in effect, to be this: That by the Statute plaintiff or its stockholders are deprived of property without due process of law. The power of the State is exercised through designated officers, the railroad commissioners, by proceedings specially provided to enforce the authority of the State. They are designated by the Code special proceedings, in which rights may be established and remedies enforced, and are pursued in many cases. Code, § 2504. Railroad corporations acquire lands to be occupied by their roads by special proceedings. Surely, the same character of proceedings may be invoked to enforce the performance by them of lawfully imposed duty. The proceedings provide for notice to the railroad companies, and that they shall be heard in regard to the questions of joint rates. Acts 23d Gen. Assem. chap. 17, § 4. It is a mistake to suppose that "due process of law" is found only in law or chancery actions. Special proceedings, applicable to specified subject-matter, and conformable to the rules requiring notice and the acquisition of jurisdiction, and which affect all persons alike, whose property or rights come within the lawful scope of the proceedings, are prosecuted with "due process of law." 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title Due Process of Law. The Statutes are designed to prevent railroad corporations from charging unreasonable rates for the transportation of property. Surely, it cannot be claimed that they are deprived of property and property rights by restrictions against unreasonable charges. In this connection counsel repeat objections founded upon what they term "enforced contractual relations" between the railroad companies. We have shown that these joint through rates are often agreed upon by the railroad companies. They determine, in the common course of business, the division of charges, and where and to whom they shall be paid. Under the Statute in question, it is made the duty of the railroad companies to establish joint through rates. If they fail to perform the duty, the railroad commissioners will establish the rates as they should have done, and will do just as they should have done and could have done,—prescribe as to the time and place of payment, and division of charges. There will be no more difficulty in obeying the requirements of the railroad commission than in performing their own agreements for joint through rates, entered into in the course of their business. It is plain that the rights of plaintiff will not be invaded under this Statute, and it will suffer no oppression.

10. It is argued that the Statutes are void for the reason the railroad commissioners are not a judicial body, and ought not to be permitted to fix rates which shall be regarded as prima facie reasonable. The question of the reasonableness of the rates, it is argued, ought to be judicially determined; and so it can be if the action of the commission is not satisfactory to the Railroad Company. The provision of the Statute that the rates fixed by the commissioners shall be regarded as prima facie reasonable is not of an unusual character, and was enacted in the exercise of the undoubted power of the State to prescribe rules of evidence in all proceedings under the laws of the State. The law presumes the acts of officers of the State to be rightly done, and gives them faith accordingly. This rule is not unlike the provision of the Statute complained of by plaintiff. The courts of law and chancery are open to the railroad corporations, for proceedings to review the acts of the commissioners in fixing rates of charges.

11. It is urged that the Statutes are in conflict with article 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States, in that it is an attempt to regulate commerce between the States. The position is based upon these alleged facts. The plaintiff's road, in its route between Burlington and Rock Rapids, passes through a part of Minnesota. Trains running between these cities would pass through another State, and therefore counsel conclude shipments between these cities, on these trains, is interstate commerce. We need not determine whether traffic between cities of the same State in merchandise, which, pursuant to the traffic, is transferred from one city of the State to another, by a route partly in another State, by a railway company organized under the laws of the State, which carries the merchandise within the jurisdiction of the other State, is interstate commerce. See, on this question, Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (Pa.), 17 Atl. Rep. 179, and State v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 40 Minn. 267, recognizing adverse rules, the first maintaining that such a transaction is not interstate commerce. The petition does not allege that defendants are about to fix joint rates between Burlington and Rock Rapids. If it be not lawful for them to do so, we will presume, when called on to act, they will not fix such a joint through rate. We would not annul a statute on the ground of a fear of its erroneous execution in one particular. Upon the question of law presented by counsel we intimate no opinion.

12. Chapter 28, Acts 22d Gen. Assem., provides that, when recovery is had for its violation, attorney's fees are adjudged against the defendant. It is insisted that a privilege is here granted to a suitor which is withheld from other citizens. All citizens having litigation of the character indicated, have equal rights to recover attorney's fees. The Legislature may prescribe rules permitting recovery of double damages or attorney's fees in one class of cases, and deny it in all others. There is no inequality therein forbidden by the Constitution and laws.

13. It is insisted that the provision imposes a "penalty for exercising the right of defense." It will be seen that, if the defense is established, there can be no penalty; if it be not, it will be rightly imposed.

14. It is urged that the Statute is void for uncertainty, in that it does not define the offense for which the penalties provided may be imposed. These offenses are explicitly defined in chapter 28, Acts 22d Gen. Assem. §§ 11, 23. It is said the Statute is uncertain, because it does not prescribe what shall constitute a reasonable rate. It declares that the rate fixed by the commission shall be prima facie evidence that it is reasonable. But it permits the accused to show in defense that it is not reasonable. The law requires reasonable rates to be charged. What constitutes such rates is a question of fact to be determined under the rules of the law. But it is said that the commissioners' rate would not secure the accused from conviction if it be shown that the charges fixed by the commissioners are excessive,—greater than is reasonable. But the purpose of the provision authorizing the commission to fix rates is to determine a maximum rate, beyond which the railroad company may not charge. It may charge the rate fixed, but no more. In prosecutions to recover penalties for the violation of the Statute, the State is precluded from denying that the commissioners' rates are reasonable.

15. It is urged that the fines imposed by the Statute for its violation are excessive, and forbidden by the State Constitution. Art. 1, § 17. The fines are intended to enforce obedience to the law by corporations having great incomes and controlling vast properties. The Legislature, in exercise of its wisdom, fixed penalties which, if imposed upon individuals, might appear excessive, but when imposed upon the corporations would be esteemed no greater than is necessary to enforce obedience to the Statute. The railroad companies have a ready and efficient way of avoiding these severe penalties, namely, by obeying truly the laws of the State. If they do this, they are in no danger of the penalties; if they do not, they are in no condition to complain of the laws.

16. It is insisted that the rates established under authority conferred by chapter 17, Acts

23d Gen. Assem., are absolute, and, upon the questions of their justice and reasonableness, are final and conclusive. The third section confers such authority upon the railroad commissioners. It is insisted that this section fails to provide that the rates shall be only prima facie evidence that they are just and reasonable. It is claimed by counsel that the last sentence is unintelligible,—at least so uncertain as to be incapable of construction. It may be assumed, for the purpose of the argument, that this position is correct. It is evident that this section is not wholly in the language used in its enactment by the General Assembly; the history of the law supports this conclusion. The Act containing the provision is amendatory to chapter 28, Acts 23d Gen. Assem., and confers authority to fix joint through rates, which was not done in the prior Statute. That Statute provides that the rates fixed by the railroad commissioners shall be prima facie evidence that they are just and reasonable. The amendatory Statute provides that in making joint rates, and in changing and revising the same, the railroad commissioners shall be governed, as nearly as may be, by all the provisions of the Act to which it is amendatory, and that the punishments and penalties provided in the prior Act shall be inflicted for the violation of the amendatory Act. See sections 1, 5. No other punishments and penalties are prescribed. It will be observed that section 5, in express language, declares that the punishments and penalties contemplated by the Act shall be inflicted for unjust and unreasonable charges. The charges fixed by the railroad commissioners are, under the Statute, prima facie evidence of their reasonableness. For the violation of the law in charging more than reasonable joint rates, as determined by law, punishments and penalties are alone provided. We conclude that, according to the obvious construction of the two Statutes, read together, the joint rates are not absolute, but are prima facie evidence only of their reasonableness and justice. The construction of the Statutes we have adopted gives it effect; that insisted upon by plaintiff would defeat it. We are required, under the familiar rules of the law, the Statute being susceptible of conflicting and doubtful construction, to adopt that one which supports the Statute in all its parts, and if the Statute in some of its provisions be so indefinite, uncertain or unintelligible as to be incapable of enforcement, or be void because of conflict with the Constitution, or for any other reason, we must sustain the Statute in all its parts which are not subject to such objections.

17. Another familiar rule of the law requires courts to uphold statutes unless they are so plainly and palpably in conflict with the Constitution as to leave no doubt or hesitation in the judicial mind of their invalidity. Stewart v. Polk County Suprs. 80 Iowa, 9; Central Iowa R. Co. v. Wright County Suprs. 67 Iowa, 199; Gates v. Brooks, 59 Iowa, 510; Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 805. It cannot be fairly claimed that the Statutes in question are plainly and without a doubt unconstitutional.

18. Counsel for plaintiff insist that the order of the district court in overruling the motion to dissolve the injunction, must be affirmed on this ground: The motion to dissolve admits the allegations of the petition. It is claimed one of these allegations is "that joint rates, as contemplated by the Statute, would so reduce plaintiff's income as to render its business unremunerative." It is insisted that, upon this admission, it must be held that the Statutes in question would have the effect to deprive plaintiff of its property. Without inquiry whether the effect of the Statute upon plaintiff's business, as claimed, would be ground of holding it invalid, and enjoining its enforcement, we think the loss of plaintiff's property is not shown in plaintiff's petition. The language of the petition upon which counsel base the position under consideration is this: "That by said Acts your petitioner is denied the right and liberty of contracting with reference to its business, and therefore is its property taken from it without consent, and it is compelled to enter into involuntary, unreasonable and unprofitable contracts with other railroad companies, at the instance of third parties, compelling the operation of its road at a loss." What is averred here as to the deprivation of property, and the future operations of the road at a loss, are mere conclusions as to supposed effects. It does not amount to an allegation of facts. It is the mere statement of a conclusion that the road would be operated at a loss because plaintiff would be compelled by the Statute to enter into involuntary, unreasonable and unprofitable contracts. The allegation in question is indeed a conclusion based upon another conclusion as to the supposed operations of the Statute.

19. It is also insisted that, as the dissolving of an injunction is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the court, the refusal of the court below will not be disturbed unless it appears such discretion has been abused. But this rule does not apply to cases involving questions of law arising upon the face of the petition itself. If it appear upon the face of the pleadings that, as a matter of law, the injunction ought not to have been granted, it will be dissolved. Surely, the operations of a Statute of a State will not be suspended by injunction for conflict with the Constitution, under this doctrine of discretion, when the petition therefor, upon its face, shows that it is constitutional, or that it is not clearly and without doubt unconstitutional. The failure to dissolve the injunction, upon proper motion, was not done in the exercise of judicial discretion. The enforcement and obedience to the rules of law are not left to the discretion of the court.

20. The views just expressed, and the rules upon which they are based, dispose of another position of counsel, namely, that the injunction will not be dissolved on motion, because the facts alleged in the petition are not denied by answer, and that the relief sought will not be effectual if the injunction be not maintained. But there are no issues of fact raised by this motion,—they are all of law. The issues involve the validity of the Statutes in question. If they be held valid, no facts are alleged in the petition which will defeat them.

21. Much is said in argument attacking the justice and policy of the Statutes. With these things we have nothing to do. They are for the consideration of the legislative department of the government alone.

These views dispose of all questions arising in the case, and lead us to the conclusion that the judgment of the District Court ought to be reversed.

Rothrock, J., dissenting:

It appears to me that the foregoing opinion is unsound in its reasoning, and wrong in its conclusions, upon two questions involved in the record in the case. These questions involve the validity of certain provisions found in chapter 17, Laws 28d Gen. Assem. I believe that parts of that Act are plainly invalid, and ought not to be upheld by this court; and it is proper to say here that the question as to the power of the Legislature to authorize the railroad commissioners to establish and promulgate joint rates for the transportation of freight over connecting lines of railroads is not necessary to be determined in this case. The question is, Does the said Act, by reason of its plain language, violate the Constitution of the United States and of this State, in so far as it compels a common carrier to perform service without compensation, or to surrender its property to another carrier, and thus deprive it of its property, without due process of law? The first question arises upon the second section of the Act. It is therein provided that "carload lots shall be transferred without unloading from the cars in which such shipments were first made, unless such unloading in other cars shall be done without charge therefor to the shipper or receiver of such carload lots, and such transfer be made without unreasonable delay." This provision of the law is absolute. It seeks to compel the initial carrier to deliver its loaded cars to the connecting carrier without any rule or regulation for its return, and without its consent, or to unload the contents of the car into other cars without compensation. It is apparent that the initial carrier is compelled by the Act to name to the shipper a joint through rate over all the lines of road which the shipper may designate. The law attempts to compel the initial carrier, if the freight be paid in advance, to account to all other carriers for their proportion of the charges, or, if the freight be paid to the last carrier, it becomes the agent or collector for all the others. This enforces contractual relations against the will of the parties, and it is no answer to say that it is not in the nature of a contract, but that it is a rule or regulation prescribed by law. It partakes of the nature of a contract, by whatever name it may be called; and the fact that carriers over connecting lines do, by contract, make through shipments, is no reason why they should not be allowed to make their own contracts, at least so far as to protect themselves in the collection of their freight charges, and in the control of their cars. They should have this power, or the law should provide for such regulations as would protect them in their undoubted rights.

The second question is whether, by the Act under consideration, the joint rates fixed by the commissioners are to be regarded as absolute. The last part of section 8 of the Act is unintelligible. What is intended thereby cannot be determined without the interpolation of words, so as to give meaning to that which is absolutely unmeaning. I am not aware that any court has ever, under the guise of construction, entered upon the field of legislation to the extent required to hold that the Act provides that the schedule of rates shall be prima facie evidence that the same are reasonable and just; and the attempt to find ground upon which to hold the Act valid, by reference to the Act of which it purported to be amendatory, it seems to me is equally unwarranted. Without elaborating these questions, I conclude that no court ought to be called upon to uphold an Act like this, which attempts to control the most important rights without the semblance of an effort to protect the parties affected thereby. In addition to the failure to make the third section intelligible, the second section requires that, if the initial carrier does not deem it prudent to deliver its car to the connecting line for any reason, such as that the car is required to transact its own business, or that it may have to institute legal proceedings to procure its return, the contents shall be unloaded "in other cars" without unreasonable delay. It is to be supposed that this means other cars, the property of the connecting line. It cannot discharge its obligation by unloading in a warehouse, if the connecting carrier neglects to furnish other cars. It appears to me that it will be time enough to authorize the establishment of through rates when a law shall be passed making provision for the protection of the rights of property which are everywhere and at all times regarded as sacred, and of which the owner cannot be deprived, even by legislative authority, without due process of law. In my opinion, the order and judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Osborn & Mills, for appellant:

It was not necessary that the outstanding notes should be tendered back and defendant be put in statu quo before the right to retake possession might be exercised, for such a course will not leave the plaintiff in statu quo.

On the back of which appears the following:

"§—. 188—. For value received, — after date, — promise to pay to the order of James W. Tufts — dollars, with interest —. Payable at the — Bank. —. Due —."

The apparatus was shipped to and accepted by defendant. It was agreed between the parties that defendant should ship to and that the plaintiff should receive, to apply upon the purchase price of the apparatus, a second-hand Puffer soda-water fountain, for which he was to be allowed $500 upon the purchase price of the new fountain, and that for the balance of $1,100 he should give his notes similar in form to that upon the back of said order; that on the 21st of March, 1888, the defendant executed at Kalamazoo and forwarded to the plaintiff 44 notes, for $25 each, due at the rate of $25 per month, all being in form as follows:

"$25.00. Kalamazoo, Mich., Mch. 21, 1888.

"For value received, November 10, 1888, after date, I promise to pay to the order of James W. Tufts, twenty-five dollars, with interest 4 per cent. The consideration of this and other notes is the following described soda-water apparatus: One 24-10 R. Form and fancy Siberian Missouri, No. 687, with water attached. Three 10-gal. seamless cop. founts, which I have received of said James W. Tufts. Nevertheless, it is understood by and between me and the said James W. Tufts that the title to the above-mentioned property does not pass to me, and that until all said notes are paid the title to the aforesaid property shall remain in the said James W. Tufts, who shall have the right, in case of nonpayment at maturity of either of said notes, without process of law, to enter and retake, and may enter and retake, immediate possession of the said property, wherever it may be, and remove the same. Payable at First Nat'l Bank, Kalamazoo, Mich., 151 So. Burdick St. E. R. D'Arcambal. Due Nov. 10, 1888."

The old apparatus was shipped to plaintiff, and credited as agreed. Ten of the notes were afterwards paid. Nine others had become due, and were unpaid, and, after demand made, plaintiff took out his writ of replevin, and obtained possession of the property. All of the unpaid notes were in possession of plaintiff, and were not tendered back to defendant before the commencement of suit. The defendant, under objection and exception, introduced evidence tending to establish the condition and value of the apparatus replevied by the plaintiff of defendant at the time thereof, and tending to prove that it had not substantially depreciated in value; and also testimony tending to show the amount of such depreciation, and the rental value of such apparatus for the time it was used by defendant. Counsel for plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, and that the defendant had no lien upon the property in controversy, and was not entitled to any allowance or verdict on account of the money paid by him towards the purchase price of the property over and above the depreciation of it, and a fair rental for its use during the time it was in defendant's possession, or on account of the Puffer soda-water fountain received by plaintiff from him. The court declined to charge the jury as so requested, and to such refusal counsel for plaintiff excepted; and thereupon the court, at the request of the defendant, instructed the jury that defendant had a lien upon the property, and was entitled to recover as against the plaintiff such a sum as they found from the evidence would be just between the parties, after deducting a fair amount for the rental value of the property during the time that it was in the possession of the defendant, and for any depreciation in value it had sustained during that period; to which instruction and ruling plaintiff by his counsel excepted. The jury rendered the following verdict: "That the said defendant did unlawfully detain the goods and chattels mentioned in manner and form as the said plaintiff has in his declaration in this cause complained against him, and that they assess the damages of the said plaintiff by reason thereof at the sum of six cents. And they further find that the said defendant has a lien upon or special property in said goods and chattels to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250)." Upon this verdict the following judgment was entered: "The jury by whom the issue in this cause was tried, having found by their verdict that the said defendant did unlawfully detain the goods and chattels in said plaintiff's declaration, as herein alleged, and having assessed the damages of plaintiff by reason of the unlawful detention of said goods and chattels at the sum of six cents over and above the costs and charges by him about the suit in this behalf expended, and the said jurors having further found that said defendant hath a lien upon or special property in said goods and chattels to the amount of $250, and is not the general owner thereof, but that said plaintiff is the general owner of the said goods and chattels, subject to the lien aforesaid of said defendant: Therefore it is further considered that said defendant do recover against the said plaintiff the said sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, being the amount of his special property in said goods and chattels so by the jurors in form aforesaid found, and that said defendant have execution thereof; and it is further considered that the said plaintiff do recover against the said defendant his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended to be taxed, and that he have execution thereof."

Plaintiff appeals, alleging the following errors: "First. The court erred in allowing the defendant to introduce evidence tending to establish the condition and value of the apparatus replevied by the plaintiff from the defendant at the time thereof, and tending to prove that it had not substantially depreciated in value, and also in permitting the defendant to introduce evidence tending to show the amount of such depreciation, and the rental value of such an apparatus for the time it was used by the defendant, and in overruling the objections thereto made in behalf of the plaintiff. Second. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, and that the defendant had no lien upon the property in controversy, and was not entitled to any allowance or verdict on account of the money paid by him towards the purchase price of the property over and above the depreciation of it, and a fair rental for its use during the time it was in defendant's possession, or on account of the Puffer soda-water fountain received by plaintiff from him. Third. The court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant had a lien upon the property, and was entitled to recover as against the plaintiff such a sum as they found from the evidence would be just between the parties, after deducting a fair amount for the rental value of the property during the time that it was in the possession of the defendant, and for any depreciation in value it had sustained during that period. Fourth. The court erred in rendering the judgment entered in said cause, in manner and form as it was rendered and entered therein."

It will be observed that the contract here does not provide for a rescission thereof before plaintiff should have the right to reduce the property to his possession, nor does it provide that the taking of possession should rescind the contract or work a forfeiture of the amount paid upon the apparatus, but the plaintiff treats the contract as still existing and executory. The contract provides expressly that the title to the property shall continue to remain in plaintiff until the apparatus is paid for, and that, in case of the nonpayment of either of the notes at maturity, the plaintiff should have the right to take possession of the property; but it contains no provision that such act shall operate as a rescission of the contract, or a forfeiture of the payments thereon. The reduction of the property to possession by plaintiff does not excuse performance by defendant, as defendant has the right, upon payment of the amount due, to a return of the property. Plaintiff had the right, under the express conditions of the contract, to secure himself by taking possession, and the exercise of this right under the contract did not entitle the defendant to rescind the contract, or to a recovery of the amount paid, or to a delivery to him of the unpaid notes; neither did it give him any lien upon the property for the amount paid by him. The court erred, therefore, in refusing to direct a verdict for plaintiff, and in instructing the jury that defendant had a lien upon the property for any amount.

Plaintiff was entitled to judgment, and to his damages for the unlawful detention of his property as fixed by the jury, and to that extent the judgment below is affirmed and reversed as to the residue, with costs of both courts to plaintiff.

The other Justices concurred.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

BENNETT, Piff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF GEORGIA.

(...Ga....)

1. Allowing the State's counsel to argue before the jury after objection by the prisoner's counsel that the defendant's character is bad because he had a right to prove his good character and has not done so, is an error which will require a reversal of a conviction.
2. Improper argument by defendant's counsel by making statements outside the evidence as to his client's good character will not justify the State's counsel in arguing, against defendant's objection, that his failure to offer proof of good character raises an inference that his character was not good.

NOTE.—Criminal practice, comments of prosecuting counsel on absence of witnesses, and testimony.

In exercising the right of summing up evidence it is not proper for counsel for the prosecution to comment on the absence of witnesses for the defense. Reg. v. Rudland, 4 Fost. & F. 495; Reg. v. Puddick, 4 Fost. & F. 497.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Hart County to review a conviction of defendant for burglary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCurry & Proffitt for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Harrison & Peeples, with Mr. W. M. Howard, Sol. Gen., for the State.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Bennett was tried for the offense of burglary, and was convicted. He made a motion for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted. One of the grounds of the motion is that the prosecuting attorney, in the closing argument, argumentation and moral character it is improper for counsel to argue to the jury that his failure to do so may be considered against him. Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 124.

The law not only presumes that every person is innocent until he is proven to be guilty, but it also presumes that a person has a good character and reputation until the contrary is shown by evidence, and the jury has no right to consider the omission on the part of defendant to introduce evidence of his good character. 1 Wharton, Cr. L. § 637; State v. Tozier, 49 Me. 404; People v. Bodine, 1 Denio, 281; Sackett, Inst. Jur. 651. See note to Com. v. Cleary (Pa.) 8 L. R. A. 302.

gued that the defendant had a bad character; that he had a right to prove his good character, and had not done so. The defendant objected to this, and requested the court not to allow it. The court stated that the argument was proper, and he would allow it to proceed. Following is a note which the court attaches to this ground: "The first ground of the motion for new trial is true, with the following additional statement in connection with what occurred and in explanation thereof: In his argument before the jury defendant's counsel had stated and reiterated repeatedly (1) his personal conviction that the defendant was an honest man, and a man of good character, and that nothing criminal had ever before been charged against him; (2) that the defendant was a man of as good a character as Bowers, one of the State's witnesses, and stood as well in the community as Bowers did; (3) that Duncan, a witness for the State, was a man of good character, and had employed defendant for six years, and that Duncan would not have done so if defendant was a thief; and (4) that defendant stood well among his neighbors, and was regarded where he lived as an honest man, and one of good character, so far as the evidence in this case disclosed. In replying to these arguments the solicitor general said that in doubtful cases—in cases where the State had proved many suspicious facts and circumstances against a defendant—the law allowed him to prove his good character; and that, if this defendant was a man of such good character and reputation as his counsel had insisted he was, why had he not called some of his neighbors to prove his good character, and that his failure to do so must be because he had no such good reputation. When the point was made that this argument was improper the court refused to interrupt the solicitor general because of the fact that defendant's counsel had made the statements above mentioned." We think the court erred in allowing the State's counsel to argue before the jury, after objection by the prisoner's counsel that the defendant's character was bad because he had a right to prove his good character and had not done so. The accused is not bound to put his character in issue. If he omits to do so no inference of his guilt can be drawn therefrom by the jury. The general rule is that the omission to show good character does not justify a presumption that the character is bad, from which an inference of guilt can be drawn. People v. Bodine, 1 Deno. 281; Ackley v. People, 9 Barb. 609; State v. Docketader, 42 Iowa, 436; State v. O'Neal, 7 Ired. L. 251; State v. Upham, 38 Me. 261; Stephens v. State, 20 Tex. App. 255; People v. White, 24 Wend. 520; Donoghos v. People, 6 Park. Cr. Rep. 120; Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 270; Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 184; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1119.

The State is bound to prove the guilt of a defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, whether his character has been good or bad. It does not follow because an accused person may have a bad character that he is guilty of the particular offense for which he is being tried. Counsel both for the State and the accused should be compelled by the court to confine themselves in their arguments to the evidence in the case. In this State the defendant has a right to make a statement of his defense to the jury; 12 L. R. A.

and it has been held in several cases that the State's counsel, where the defendant omitted to make such statement, had no right to argue that fact to the jury. Nor can the jury infer guilt from the defendant's omission to make the statement. If the State's counsel is not allowed to argue this fact to the jury, why should he be permitted to argue that the omission to prove good character is evidence of bad character? Why should the jury be permitted to infer that his character is bad because he has omitted to prove good character? The trial judge, however, certifies that he permitted the State's counsel to make this argument because the prisoner's counsel had argued to the jury that the prisoner had a good character, etc.; meaning thereby that, as the prisoner's counsel had argued to the jury a fact which was not in evidence, it was proper to allow the State's counsel to reply to that argument, and to say that the prisoner's character was bad because he had a right to prove good character and had failed to do so.

In State v. Upham, supra, the indictment charged the accused with having in his possession counterfeit bank-bills. He offered no evidence of his general good character, but his counsel argued to the jury that from his position in society as postmaster his character ought to avail him in aid of the common presumption of innocence. Counsel for the government argued that the want of such testimony authorized the jury to infer that his character was bad. Refusal of the court to instruct the jury, upon request, that this failure to offer such proof afforded no inference of guilt, or that the character was not good, was held error.

There are many authorities which hold that the law presumes that a defendant has a good character. This was held in the case of Stephens v. State, 20 Tex. App. 269; and in the case of Cluck v. State, supra, the Supreme Court of Indiana held that the law presumes that every man has a good character, and that it would have been competent for counsel to have commented on such presumption. This rule is also laid down in Sackett on Instructions to Juries, p. 500.

In the case of Goggans v. Monroe, 31 Ga. 381, the defendant's counsel, in his argument, insisted that the plaintiff's character was bad, whereupon counsel for the plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury that the law presumed the plaintiff to be of good character until the contrary was shown by proof. The trial judge refused to charge as requested, and this court held that "it was error in the court to refuse to charge, on request, that the law presumes the character of the party to be good until the contrary is proven." Jenkins, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "Defendant's counsel having argued that plaintiff's character was bad, and this argument being likely to prejudice his case before the jury, he was entitled to the legal presumption that in the absence of evidence proving the contrary, his character was good; and it was error in the court to refuse to charge, on request, that the law did so presume." But, whether this be true or not, we hold that the court erred in allowing the State's counsel, over the objection of the prisoner's counsel, to make this argument to the jury, although the latter had first violated the rules of court by going outside of the evidence. The fact that the prisoner's counsel had violated the rule would not authorize the State's counsel to do likewise. To hold that because counsel on one side violates a rule of court in his address to the jury by making statements outside of the evidence the opposing counsel has the right to violate the rule in like manner, over objections of opposing counsel, would be to turn a court, where justice should be administered according to the rules of evidence and of law, into a town meeting. We could as well hold that, if the prisoner's counsel introduces illegal evidence, the State's counsel can reply by introducing other illegal evidence; and this, we have held, cannot be done. Woolfolk v. State, 81 Ga. 551.

In the case of Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial was that the court erred in allowing the solicitor general, in the concluding argument, although objected to by counsel for the accused, to support the testimony of Eilands by stating that he was an unwilling witness for the State, that he had refused to come under subpoena, and was brought by arrest under attachment, none of which was in evidence before the jury; the court remarking that it was allowable because B. K. Harrison, one of the defendant's counsel, in his argument to the jury, had stated that Eilands was locked up on the Sabbath before the trial with the father-in-law of the deceased and the prosecutor, drinking with them, none of which was in evidence, Mr. Harrison contending that Eilands was a willing and a bribed witness. In the opinion (p. 628), Nisbet, J., in dealing with this ground, said: "The seventh exception is founded on the refusal of the court to restrain the solicitor general, although requested so to do by counsel for the prisoner, from commenting on facts not in evidence in his concluding speech to the jury. This, we think, was an error. We have had occasion to consider the habit of counsel in addressing the jury of commenting upon matters not proven and not growing out of the pleadings before, and have been content with visiting it with a decided and emphatic disapproval. Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 522, 523. We entertain no shadow of doubt as to the necessity of pronouncing it, as we now do, illegal, and highly prejudicial to a fair and just administration of the rights of parties, either on the criminal or civil side of the court. It is the duty of the court to prevent such comments; and in all cases where this is not done, provided the court is requested to prevent them, we shall hold, as we rule in this case, that it is good ground for a new trial. There was, it is true, some excuse for the license conceded to the solicitor general in this case in the fact that counsel for the prisoner had already taken the same liberty in his argument to the jury. The solicitor general no doubt felt called upon by the obligations of his office to remove any wrong impression which the argument of counsel for the prisoner had made as to the credibility of the witness. Disregarding, however, these things, we have no option but to make this case the occasion of establishing a rule upon this subject. In doing this, I am sure that it is scarcely necessary to say that we disclaim any purpose of inflicting a personal censure upon the able and upright judge who presided in the cause, or upon the counsel and the prosecuting officer. If no other reason existed for this disclaimer (and there are many) sufficient reason would be found in the usage of our courts, which has gone very far to sanction the habit referred to. Its practical tendency is bad upon the court, the bar and the jury. If this were all, perhaps our duty would stop with the expression of such an opinion; but this is not all, for in our judgment it is violative of the rights of the citizen litigant in the course of justice; and, if so, we are not at liberty to stop short of making it cause for a new trial." See also, upon the same line, Trucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 817; State v. Upham, 88 Me. 281; Hennies v. Vogel, 87 Ill. 242; Fox v. People, 95 Ill. 71; Rochester v. Shaw, 100 Ind. 268; Forryth v. Cothran, 61 Ga. 278; Johnson v. Slappay, 85 Ga. 576; Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297; Com. v. Scott, 128 Mass. 289; McDonald v. People, 126 Ill. 150, 9 Am. St. Rep. 547, and note.

The proper practice, according to the majority of the cases above cited, would have been for the prisoner's counsel to have requested the court to charge the law contrary to that as asserted by the solicitor general in his address to the jury. The record shows, however, that he did object to the remarks of the solicitor general, and requested the court to stop him; but that the court refused to do so, holding that the remarks were proper, and thereby giving the jury to understand that the rule of law laid down by the solicitor general was the correct one, and that they might make the inferences claimed by the prosecuting officer. Under this state of facts it was scarcely necessary for the prisoner's counsel to request the court to charge a contrary view of the law.

This being a very close case on the facts, and the language of the State's counsel being calculated to prejudice the jury against the defendant, we reverse the judgment of the court below in refusing to grant a new trial upon this ground.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.)

Re Probate of the Paper Writing Propounded as the Last WILL and Testament OF Cecelia L. BOOTH, Deceased.

Geraldine Josephine TIMONEY, Appt.,

v.

Joseph A. BOOTH, Respt.

(.....N. Y.....)

That the maker's name, which appears only in the beginning of an instrument written by himself and purporting to be a will was intended to have effect as his signature in final execution of the will is not shown by his handing the instrument to another with the statement "This is my will; take and sign it."

(June 2, 1891.)

A PPEAL by proponent from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, revoking the probate of a will which had been granted by the Surrogate of New York County and also from orders denying proponent's motions for judgment probating the will or for new trial and granting contestant's motion to reject the will. Affirmed.

Statement by Follett, Ch. J.:

On the 16th of June, 1884, Cecelia L. Booth, a resident of the State of New Jersey, and the wife of the contestant, wrote in her own hand a paper, which was signed by two witnesses, of which the following is a copy: "If I, Cecelia L. Booth, should die within the year 1884, I leave to my sister, Geraldine Josephine Timoney, all money due me from my late deceased father's will; also my wearing apparel and furniture; and I also leave to my little nephew, Albert Philip Timoney, all money deposited in the Emigrant Savings Bank in my maiden name, Cecelia L. Hatfield. Witnessed by Amelia Kurru, Mamie Clifford. June 16, 1884." August 10, 1884, Mrs. Booth, then a citizen of the State of New Jersey, died in that State, leaving personal property in the City and County of New York. Geraldine Josephine Timoney presented the instrument to the Surrogate's Court of the City and County of New York as the last will and testament of Cecelia L. Booth, and asked to have it admitted to probate as such, which was contested by the husband of Mrs. Booth. The surrogate held that the instrument was well executed under the laws of New Jersey, and admitted it to probate. 8 Dem. Sur. 414. On an appeal to the general term the decision of the surrogate was reversed, and a new trial directed by a jury. 38 Hun, 644. The following questions were submitted to the jury, all of which were found in the affirmative, except the eighth, which was answered in the negative. "(1) Was the paper propounded as the last will and testament of Cecelia L. Booth, deceased, written by her? (2) If such paper was written by said Cecelia L. Booth, where was it written? (3) Was the name 'Cecelia L. Booth,' appearing on the first line of said paper, written or made by Cecelia L. Booth, the deceased wife of the contestant? (4) If said name, 'Cecelia L. Booth,' was written by Cecelia L. Booth, deceased, was it written by her in the presence of two witnesses who were present at the same time, and who subscribed their names to said paper as witnesses in the presence of said Cecelia L. Booth? (5) If the name 'Cecelia L. Booth,' was written by Cecelia L. Booth, deceased, did she acknowledge the writing or making thereof in the presence of two witnesses, who were present at the same time, and who subscribed their names to said paper as witnesses in the presence of said Cecelia L. Booth? (6) If said paper and said name of 'Cecelia L. Booth' was written or made by said Cecelia L. Booth, deceased, did she declare the same to be her last will in the presence of two witnesses, present at the same time, who subscribed their names thereto as witnesses in the presence of said Cecelia L. Booth? (7) Was said Cecelia L. Booth, at the time of making or executing said paper, mentally competent to make or execute a last will and testament? (8) If Cecelia L. Booth, at the time of making or executing said paper, was mentally competent to execute a last will and testament, was such paper procured under undue or improper influence or fraud?"

The proponent applied for a judgment at the general term, which was denied, and the contestant for a new trial, which was granted, on the ground that the answer to the fifth question was not sustained by the evidence. 18 N. Y. S. R. 844.

Upon the second trial by jury all of the issues were again found in favor of the proponent, but the general term again denied proponent's motion for judgment, and denied the contestant's motion for a new trial on all of the questions, but held that the answer of the jury to the fifth question was unsupported by the evidence, and directed a new trial of that question only.

Upon the third trial by jury they were directed to answer the fifth question in the negative. Upon appeal to the general term the direction was sustained, and it was held that the will was not entitled to be probated, from which judgment an appeal was taken to the court of appeals.

Mr. J. Stewart Ross, with Mr. Alfred T. Ackert, for appellant:

The will offered for probate having been wholly written by the testatrix, her name, written by her at the beginning thereof, was a sufficient signing of the same under the Statute of New Jersey.

See Lemayne v. Stanley, 8 Lev. 1; Selden v. Coalter, 2 Va. Cas. 558; Re Miles, 4 Dana, 1; Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 256; Allen v. Everett, 12 B. Mon. 371; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 29 Ala.

NOTE.—Will; sufficiency of signature. See note to Knox's App. (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 367.

As to signature and sufficiency of acknowledgment of signature, see note to Cook v. Winchester (Mich.) 8 L. R. A. 322.

As to execution of holographic will, see Warwick v. Warwick (Va.) 6 L. R. A. 775, and note. 12 L. R. A.

538; Watts v. Public Administrator, 4 Wend. 168; Fritz v. Turner, 46 N. J. Eq. 516.

The facts proven show a good acknowledgment of the will. There could have been no acknowledgment of the will without an acknowledgment of the signature.

Under the circumstances of this case, some distinct recognition by the decedent, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, of the name, "Cecilia L. Booth," in the top line of the alleged will, as and for her signature intended to authenticate the instrument, must be affirmatively proved.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At common law, if a person wrote his name in the body of a will or contract with intent to execute it in that manner, the signature so written was as valid as though subscribed at the end of the instrument. Merritt v. Clason, 12 Johns. 102; S. C. sub nom. Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484; People v. Murray, 5 Hill, 468; Caton v. Caton, L. R. 2 H. L. 127; 2 Kent, Com. 511; 1 Dart, Vend. 6th ed. 270; 1 Jarman, Wills, Bigelow's ed. 79.

We shall assume, without deciding, that under the laws of New Jersey a will may be legally executed if the name of the testator is written by him in the body of the instrument with intent to so execute it. The Statute of that State which prescribes the mode in which wills shall be executed provides: "All wills and testaments . . . shall be in writing, and shall be signed by the testator, which signature shall be made by the testator, or the making thereof acknowledged by him, and such writing declared to be his last will, in the presence of two witnesses present at the same time, who shall subscribe their names thereto as witnesses in the presence of the testator." Under this Statute it was held (Re McElwaine, 18 N. J. Eq. 499) that "four things are required: first, that the will shall be in writing; secondly, that it shall be signed by the testator; thirdly, that such signature shall be made by the testator, or the making thereof acknowledged by him, in the presence of two witnesses; fourthly, that it shall be declared to be his last will in the presence of these witnesses. Each and every one of these requisites must exist. They are not in the alternative. The third requisite contains an alternative, but one of these alternatives must exist. The second requisite, the signing by the testator, must exist. The second alternative of the third, to wit, that he acknowledge 'making of the signature,' will not supply the want of the second. Where there is no proof as to the making of the signature, such acknowledgment is sufficient evidence that he made it, and would prove compliance with the requisite of signing by him. But when it is clear that the testator did not sign the will, this acknowledgment is not sufficient. The words of the Act are clear; and the object is equally clear, and requires this construction to the words." This language was used in respect to a will to which the name of the testatrix was subscribed by one of the subscribing witnesses at her request in her presence, and in the presence of both subscribing witnesses. After this was done the testatrix said "that was her name and seal," but did not acknowledge it to be her signature, nor did she then declare that the instrument was her will; and it was held not to have been executed in accordance with the Statute. Wherever the name of a testator appears, whether in the body or at the end of a will, it must have been written with intent to execute it; otherwise it is without force. When a testator or the maker of a contract subscribes it at the end, and in the manner in which legal instruments are usually authenticated, a presumption arises that the signature was affixed for the purpose of creating a valid instrument. But when the name is written near the beginning of the document, where, as a rule, names are inserted by way of description of the person who is to execute it, and rarely as signatures, it must, before it can be held to have been inserted for the purpose of validating the instrument, be proved to have been written with that intent. The record contains no evidence tending to show that Mrs. Booth, directly or indirectly, by word or gesture, referred to her name in the first line of the paper as her signature, nor is there evidence of any act on her part from which it might be inferred that the name there written was intended to be in execution of a completed will; and her simple declaration to Mamie Clifford, one of the subscribing witnesses, "This is my will; take it and sign it," standing alone, is insufficient to sustain a finding or verdict that the name "Cecilia L. Booth," written by her in the first line of the document, was there written with intent that it should have effect as her signature in final execution of a will. We are referred by the learned counsel for the appellant to Re Higgins, 94 N. Y. 554; Re Phillips, 98 N. Y. 267; Re Hunt, 110 N. Y. 278,—in which it was held that when a testator subscribes a will at the end, and exhibits it and the signature to the subscribing witnesses, declares it to be his last will and testament, and requests them to sign it as witnesses, it is a sufficient acknowledgment of the signature. Those cases are quite different from the one at bar, in this: The signatures having been subscribed at the end, in the usual way in which instruments are finally authenticated, the legal presumption arose that the signatures were written for the purpose of finally executing the documents. But, as we have before shown, there is no legal presumption arising from the face of this instrument that the name was written as a signature, nor is there evidence outside of the paper from which such an inference can be safely drawn. It has been the object of the statutes of the various States prescribing the mode in which wills must be executed to throw such safeguards around those transactions as will prevent fraud and imposition; and it is wiser to construe these statutes closely, rather than loosely, and so open a door for the perpetration of the mischiefs which the statutes were designed to prevent.

action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

Appeal from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo, entered upon an order dated December 31, 1890, affirming a judgment directed to be entered upon special findings of fact, and also affirming an order denying a motion for a new trial. This action was to recover damages for negligently causing the death of the plaintiff's husband, a switchman in the employ of the defendant. On the night of May 29, 1887, while at his post of duty, he was struck by heavy timbers, which fell from a passing car, and received injuries from which he soon after died. The case has been once before in this court (117 N. Y. 688), and the material facts are very fully stated in the opinion of Judge Earl there delivered. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Fraser Gluck, for appellant: It was vital error on the part of the court to submit any question regarding the sufficiency of the rules as one of fact to the jury.

There was a general custom among all railroads that the "safe stowing" of timber so that it "should not fall off the cars," was by stakes and cross-pieces. This custom may be regarded in determining the sufficiency of the rule.

The mere fact that methods, appliances, instrumentalities and machinery which have been used with safety upon scores of occasions prove insufficient at last upon a single occasion does not provide a basis upon which a master's liability can be predicated.

Loftus v. Brooklyn Union Ferry Co. 84 N. Y. 455; Dobbins v. Brown, 119 N. Y. 193.

Was it "manifest" to Ford that there was danger in thus loading the timber, and upon inspection pronouncing it safe? If the danger was "manifest" then he assumed the risk and cannot recover.

Williams v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 628.

The happening of the accident itself does not justify an inference that in any respect either in the use of machinery, or the hiring of servants, or the making of rules, the master was lacking in reasonable care.

Dobbins v. Brown, 110 N. Y. 198.

Where experience has not shown by the occurrence of some misadventure or disaster that the instrumentalities employed or the methods in use render necessary the establishment of a different or safer method, the master is not chargeable with negligence, because, upon a single occasion, a casualty has occurred.

Mr. Tracy C. Becker, for respondent:

Conceding that defendant's evidence as to its rules and usage was sufficient to raise a question as to whether or not it had not made some rule on this subject, the question still remained one of fact for the jury whether that rule was sufficient for the purpose for which it was designed.

Defendant's attempt to show a usage, and indeed its attempt to show that it had a written rule which requires all freight to be stowed, was not enough to limit its liability.

See Wright v. Boller, 20 N. Y. S. R. 874.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the first appeal of this case the judgment which the plaintiff had recovered was reversed by this court, on the ground that the cause of the accident was attributable solely to the negligence of the fellow servants of the deceased in improperly loading the lumber upon the cars. There was then no question whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to establish a proper rule or method for the loading of lumber. The court on the first trial charged the jury that there was no evidence that the defendant was called upon to establish any system of rules which should provide for any different or safer method in the loading of the lumber than that described by the witnesses, and, as the plaintiff had a verdict, no question was or could be raised on appeal as to the correctness of that charge. Upon the last trial it appeared that the only written rule that the defendant had established which it was claimed had reference to the loading of lumber was one known as No. 82, and which required its employes "to attend to the loading of all freight, whether loaded by station-men or by shippers, to see that it is safely stored, and so that it cannot fall off the cars." It appeared that the defendant had also furnished to its employes stakes to be used in making secure freight placed upon flat or gondola cars, and the witnesses for the defendant, who had loaded or inspected the cars in question, testified that they knew that stakes were necessary in making the lumber secure, and that when there were no brackets on the side of the cars, as in this case, the stakes could be placed inside the box, between the side of the car and the lumber, and fastened by being nailed or spiked to the side. But that course was not pursued in this case, for the reason that on account of the short distance the lumber was to be carried it was not deemed necessary. The plaintiff also gave proof tending to show that on other roads a verbal rule existed that in loading lumber it should be secured by stakes on the sides, and stays across the top of the load, whenever it was loaded above the side of a car, and that the rule applied in all cases, no matter what the distance was over which the lumber was to be carried; that no verbal rule of this character prevailed on defendant's road, and no instruction to that effect was ever given to its employes. This testimony was not given upon the first trial. At the close of the evidence the trial court submitted eight special questions to the jury, stating that upon the answers to those questions it would determine which party would be entitled to judgment. Upon the special findings thus made judgment was directed for the plaintiff. This mode of submitting the case to the jury was acquiesced in by both parties, but the defendant claimed, and now claims, that there was not evidence sufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the complaint should have been dismissed, and by appropriate exceptions the question is presented here whether the findings of the jury have support in the evidence.

That the car in question was improperly loaded, and that such was the cause of the intestate's death, and that he was free from any negligence contributing to the injury, are facts found by the answers to the first three questions, and are not disputed on this appeal. The seventh and eighth findings related to the question of plaintiff's damages, and the amount. The fifth question was as follows: "Did the defendant provide, make and promulgate a proper and sufficient rule with respect to the loading of the cars with lumber, including the car from which the lumber fell, which, if faithfully observed, would have given reasonable protection to its employes?" which question the jury answered in the negative. We are of the opinion that the answer to this question supports the judgment rendered. The intestate, upon entering the defendant's employ, assumed and assented to the ordinary risks incident to the service. But employers cannot avail themselves of this assent unless they take reasonable precautions to insure the servant's safety while in the performance of his duties, and there can be no exemption from liability for injuries sustained by a servant when such injuries are traced to the employer's failure to take such precautions. Within the operation of this principle a corporation is bound to carry on its business under a proper system, and under reasonable rules and regulations, and if, through a failure to establish such, a servant is injured, the corporation is liable. The master is responsible for his own negligence and want of care, and this may appear from his failure to furnish proper machinery and materials for the work, or from the employment of incompetent and unfit servants and agents, or from a failure to make proper rules or establish a proper method for the conduct of his business. These are the master's duties, and responsibility cannot be evaded by their delegation to agents. As to such acts, the agent occupies the master's place, and the latter is deemed present and liable for the manner in which they are performed. Fluke v. Boston & A. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 549; Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 46.

In the case before us it was clearly the duty of the defendant to adopt some system for the loading of lumber upon open cars that would have regard for the safety, not only of its servants and those traveling over its road, but to the safety of all persons who should be in the vicinity of its cars. The importance and extent of the business, and the manifest danger from the falling of heavy sticks of timber from the cars, required this. But there was no rule on the subject. The only rule shown to exist had no particular reference to lumber more than any other freight, and it expressed nothing more than the obligation which the law put upon the corporation, viz., to take due care that freight was safely loaded, and should not fall from the car. But method or system as to loading lumber there was none. Having furnished a good car, and stakes that might be used, the manner of loading lumber was left to the judgment and discretion of its agents and servants. It was not sufficient for the defendant to show that its employes knew that the rule I have quoted applied to lumber, and also knew that the general usage required it to be staked, and that stakes were furnished and available to the men in the particular case before us. All this may be assumed to be true, and yet the fact exists that the use of the stakes was not enjoined upon the servants by any rule of the defendant or by any instruction ever given them. Having furnished the car and the stakes, it was left to the judgment and discretion of the foreman whether to use the stakes or not, and in this particular instance they were not used, for the reason that they supposed the lumber would stay on the car over the short distance it was to be carried; and it is because of the failure of the defendant to require the use of the stakes in all cases that the neglect of its servants in this case is imputed to it. There was no rule, and the only method or system was such as the foreman in each particular case should deem the safe and proper one to pursue. Under such a state of facts, the employer must be deemed constructively present during the loading of the cars, and the acts of his agents are in law deemed to be his acts. The improper and negligent loading of the cars is thus traced directly to the defendant, and its negligence established. Thus far I have treated the construction of Rule 82 as a question of law, but in the question submitted to the jury there was opportunity for a finding of fact that the making of that rule was a sufficient performance on the part of defendant of its duties towards its servants, and it is unnecessary to say more upon the exception of the defendant to the submission of that question, as one of fact to the jury, than that it was a ruling as favorable towards it as the facts of the case warranted. The view of the case herein expressed renders unnecessary any reference to the other findings of the jury which the respondent claims establish the negligence of the defendant.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for

NOTE.—Of expert and opinion testimony as to handwriting.

An exhaustive review of the authorities will disclose the fact that the earliest reported case bearing any affinities with the one under review is that of Norman v. Morrell, decided by the English Court of Chancery in 1798 and reported in 4 Ves. Jr. 708. The contention arose over the amount of a legacy, and the solicitor for the plaintiff admitted that the original figure was "three," but he contended that it had been altered to "eight" by drawing the pen over it again and extending the upper and lower parts of the figure towards the center. To sustain this contention the Master of the Rolls admitted the testimony of an engraver who was examined as an expert upon the subject, and the lines written by the testatrix, who was of an advanced age at the time of the transaction, were proved in order to show how she made her figures. The ruling by which this testimony was admitted was sustained by the Lord Chancellor.

The law is well settled that when the characters in which a paper is written are obscure and difficult to be deciphered the evidence of persons whom practice and experience in examining writing have made skilful is competent for the purpose of aiding the court or jury in arriving at a true reading of the document. Stone v. Hubbard, 7 Cush. 505; Wigram, Wills, 3d ed. 12, 138, 139, 143; Masters v. Masters, 1 P. Wms. 426; Norman v. Morrell, 4 Ves. Jr. 709; Sheldon v. Benham, 4 Hill, 129.

Claims of the experts.

Caligraphic experts have for years asserted the possibility of investigating handwriting upon scientific principles, and the courts have consequently admitted such person to testify in cases of disputed handwriting. It is claimed that experiments and observation have disclosed the fact that there are certain general principles which may be relied upon in questions pertaining to the genuineness of handwriting. Rogers, Expert Testimony, 2d ed. § 124.

It is further claimed that no two autograph signatures written in a natural hand were perfect fac similes. In the famous Howland Will Case (Mass.) 4 Am. Law Rev. 628, 649, Professor Pierce, a very distinguished mathematician, at that time professor of mathematics in Harvard University, testified that the odds were exactly 2,896,000,000,000,000,000, that an individual could not with a pen write his name three times exactly alike.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Daniel P. Hays, for appellant:

The court erred in refusing to allow the expert to examine the receipt offered in evidence and testify as to whether the date was January or July.

See Van Wycklen v. Brooklyn, 118 N. Y. 429; Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 128; Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 288; Sheldon v. Benham, 4 Hill, 181; Stone v. Hubbard, 7 Cush. 595; Masters v. Masters, 1 P. Wms. 425; Norman v. Morrell, 4 Ves. Jr. 770; Vinton v. Peck, 14 Mich. 290.

Mr. Isaac L. Egbert, for respondent:

The opinion of the expert was properly excluded by the trial judge. This was not a case of disputed writing, and there is no rule of law under which the proposed testimony would be permissible. The acts confine the authority for such comparisons to cases of "disputed writing."

Laws 1888, chap. 555; Peck v. Callaghan, 95 N. Y. 73; Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 288.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A statement of the facts which, it seems to me, must control the decision of this appeal in this case, may be very brief. The action was brought by plaintiff to recover of defendants the moneys paid by him to them from time to time towards the purchase price of 1,000 shares of the stock of the Manhattan Refining Company, but which the defendants refused or failed to deliver pursuant to their obligations. The contract to purchase the particular block of stock in question was made about the 1st of November, 1890. It was not questioned upon the trial but that the plaintiff had contracted to purchase of defendants two other writing which obliterates all natural characteristics, unless in instances where the character is so strongly individual as not to be modified into the general mass. See the able article Autography in Chambers Edinb. Journal, July 26, 1845.

Treacherous nature of this species of evidence.

The treacherous nature of this species of evidence as to handwriting is fully recognized and is frequently referred to. Mr. Best observes, section 247, Principles of the Law of Evidence, whatever may be the relative values of the several modes of proving handwriting, it is certain that all such proof is even in its best form precarious and often extremely dangerous. The handwriting of the same person varies at different periods of life; it is affected by age, by infirmity and by habit. "Many persons, it has been well remarked, write alike having the same teacher, writing in the same office, being of the same family; all these produce similitude in handwriting which in common cases and by common observers is not liable to be distinguished." Rex v. Johnson, 29 How. St. Tr. 475. See also per Sir J. Nicholl in Constable v. Steibel, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 61.

Infirmities of this evidence.

Of all kinds of testimony admitted in a court of justice, expert and opinion evidence as to handwriting is the most unsatisfactory; it is so weak and decrepit as scarcely to deserve a place in our system of jurisprudence. Cowan v. Beall, 1 McArthur, 270. A distinguished jurist, commenting upon this grade of evidence, says, in confirmation of the above: "Everyone knows how unsafe it is to rely upon anyone's opinion concerning the niceties of penmanship. The introduction of professional experts has only added to the mischief instead of palliating it, and the results of litigation have shown that these are often the merest pretenders to knowledge whose notions are pure speculations. Opinions are necessarily received and may be valuable, but at best this kind of testimony is a necessary evil. Those who have personal acquaintance with the handwriting of a person are not always reliable in their views, and single signatures apart from some known surroundings are not always recognized by the one who made them. Every degree of removal beyond personal knowledge into the domain of what is sometimes called with great liberality scientific opinion is a step towards greater uncertainty and the science which is generally diffused is of 12 L. R. A.

very moderate value." Campbell, J., in Foster's Will Case, 34 Mich. 21.

Harmony of the decisions as to qualification of experts.

A series of decisions sustains with substantial unanimity the proposition that to render the witness an expert, competent to testify as to the genuineness of the person's signature or handwriting, he must have seen such person write or have been the recipient of social or business letters from him, which letters have been assumed to be genuine by both parties, or is shown to be competent by virtue of close study of comparison where the spurious and genuine handwriting were the subject of contrast. Strong v. Thornton, 41 Miss. 216; Reyburn v. Bellotti, 10 Mo. 597; Empire Mfg. Co. v. Stuart, 46 Mich. 438; Rogers v. Ritter, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 317, 20 L. ed. 417; Willson v. Betts, 4 Denio, 201.

It is universally conceded that evidence of handwriting may be opinion merely, and it is as universally conceded that a witness who has either seen the party write, or who not having seen him write has received letters from him which have been acted upon by him as genuine, is competent to give an opinion as to his handwriting, and this competency is not affected by the lack of frequency of observation, the length of time which has elapsed since the writing was sent or the slightness of the correspondence, although the weight of the opinion will of course depend much upon these circumstances. Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 288.

There is no rule of law that requires that a witness called to prove the handwriting of a party should have seen the party write a large number of times. Handwriting, like the countenance, form, gait and gesture of a party, is recognized by some witnesses more readily than by others, and is in some persons marked by more decisive and obsimilar blocks of stock; one in September, 1880, and before, and one in March, 1881, and after, the purchase in question. The practical contention of the plaintiff was that while the stocks purchased in September and March had been delivered, the stock purchased in November had not been delivered. The contention of the defendants was that the stock purchased in November had been delivered. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced his own and other evidence tending to establish the contention upon his behalf. The defendants, in support of their contention, introduced a receipt, of which the following is a copy: "New York Agency, Jay 22d, 1881. I have this day received from Jas. H. Blauvelt stock certificate No. 122 & 121 of the Manhattan Refining Company, which I have paid part cash and notes, John H. Dresler." A dispute thereupon arose whether the date of the receipt was January or July, 1881. The force and pertinency of the date of the receipt was clearly recognized in the charge of the learned trial judge and in the opinion of the general term. The receipt proves the delivery of two blocks of stock. The plaintiff, in his testimony, proves the delivery of two blocks of stock, but says the two blocks delivered were the purchases made in September and March. The defendants contend that the two blocks, the delivery of which are evidenced by the receipt, were the blocks purchased in September and November. If, therefore, the date of the receipt is January, it must refer to the purchases made in September and November, for the third purchase was not made till March succeeding January, 1881. Various papers relating to the transactions between plaintiff and the defendant Blauvelt, in the handwriting of the latter, were put in evidence, and, among others, a note bearing the date or the word "Jany," 1886. It was conceded that the receipt in question was in the handwriting of the defendant Blauvelt. The defendant called an expert to show that the date of the receipt was "January," and not "July." For that purpose the defendant asked various peculiarities than in others. All that is requisite is to ascertain whether the witness has seen handwriting which by an infallible test he knows to be that of the party; and then he must upon his oath declare if the writing exhibited appears to him to be that of the same party. The weight to be attached to such testimony must depend upon the ordinary tests of knowledge, the capacity of a witness, his disposition to tell the truth and the means which have been afforded him, whether from the intrinsic nature of the subject itself, or the familiarity of the witness with it, to acquire the information he assumes to have. Hideout v. Newton, 17 N. H. 71.

Latitude of the present rule.

It is pertinent, in this connection, to add that the weight of authority, as evidenced in the modern adjudication, renders the witness competent if he has seen the party write at all. Pope v. Askew, 1 Ired. L. 16; Woodford v. McClenahan, 9 Ill. 85; McNair v. Com. 26 Pa. 386; Haynie v. State, 2 Tex. App. 173.

Further review of the sustaining authorities.

The principles sought to be established by the authorities here collated are fully sustained by the case of Woodman v. Dana, 53 Me. 13, where the court in an exhaustive and carefully considered opinion by Rice, J., reviewed the authorities and stated as a principle well established that the handwriting of a person may be proved by any person who has acquired a knowledge of it, as by having seen him write, from having carried on a correspondence with him, or, as was decided in Hammond's Case, 2 Me. 33, 11 Am. Dec. 39, from an acquaintance gained from having seen handwriting acknowledged or proved by him. Page v. Romans, 14 Me. 481; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 577; Wharton, Ev. § 707, 708.

Theory of the Vermont and Massachusetts courts.

The same question has very recently been before the Supreme Court of Vermont in the case of Rowell v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 683, where the court announced the rule that where a writing is disputed and another is offered in proof as a standard the court should first find as a fact that the latter is genuine and then submit it to the jury in comparison with that in controversy. This doctrine has been re-affirmed in Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352, and again in the same case as reported in 139 Mass. 560. The present English rule is in entire accord and harmony with that now in vogue in Massachusetts and Vermont. This, however, has been peremptorily in contra-distinction of the juridical position above outlined. The courts of high standing and marked ability for whose decisions we have great respect have adopted a different rule and held that the jury should ultimately pass upon the question. State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 461, opinion by Sargent, Ch. J.

The standard of comparison.

As to the standard of comparison, it may be remarked that even in those States where the common-law rule has been relaxed by statutory innovation, it is nevertheless held that the standard of comparison sought to be introduced must be either admitted to be genuine or proved so to be by undoubted evidence. McKeone v. Barnes, 108 Mass. 344; Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600; Van Sickle v. People, 29 Mich. 61; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 455; Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. 9; Baker v. Mygatt, 14 Iowa, 131; Heard v. State, 9 Tex. App. 1.

It is reversible error to allow a document to go to the jury as a standard where the only proof of its genuineness consists in comparison by experts with some other writing admitted to be genuine. The court says: It appears to us that the genuineness of the writing made the basis of comparison, sometimes called the standard writing, should be proved by direct or positive evidence, and in an early Iowa case it was held that such proof should be by the testimony of a witness who saw it written or by the testimony of a person or by some other positive proof. Winch v. Norman, 65 Iowa, 136.

As to the comparison of the writing to be proved with other writings at common law, this could only be by documents or writings already in evidence. But this rule is disputed in many States. Henderson v. Hackney, 16 Ga. 531; Hanley v. Gandy, 28 Tex. 211; Clay v. Alderson, 10 W. Va. 49; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747; Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 39 Md. 39, 17 Am. Rep. 540; Kannon v. Gallo-way, 2 Bart. 230; Row v. Kile, 1 Leigh, 215; West v. State, 23 N. J. L. 212; Board of Trustees v. Misenheimer, 78 Ill. 22; Clark v. Rhodes, 2 Helak. 206; Otey v. Hoy, 3 Jones, L. 407; Van Sickle v. People, 29 Mich. 61; McAllister v. McAllister, 7 B. Mon. 269.

The genuineness of a signature to a lost instrument may be testified to by an expert who has examined the signature and who testifies to his recollection as compared with the genuine signature in evidence. Abbott v. Coleman, 22 Kan. 250, 31 Am. Rep. 133.

this question: "Will you state from the examination which you have made of Exhibit B, and of the comparison you have made between the handwriting on that and the handwriting on these other exhibits in Mr. Blauvelt's handwriting, what your opinion is with reference to the date on that paper?" This question was objected to by the plaintiff, but not upon any specific ground. The court excluded the question, manifestly upon the ground that the question calls for the opinion of the witness as to what the word or characters mean. To make the point of the proposed evidence and ruling more precise, the defendants' counsel asked this question: "I ask you to compare it with the exhibit you have in your hand, and then I desire to ask the question again whether, in your opinion, the word written at the heading of defendants' Exhibit B, in the place of the date, is January or July;" which, upon plaintiff's objection, was also excluded. The defendants' counsel excepted to the rulings. We think the learned trial judge erred in excluding the evidence. We will assume, as stated in the language of the court, that the object of the proof was to show by the witness what the words and characters indicating the date of the receipt were. The principle involved is whether it may be shown what the word in a written instrument is. To a person or a juror (if we may suppose the latter case) who can neither read nor write it is indispensable that someone who can should be allowed to testify what the words are. This course would be necessary in such case, however plainly written or printed the word might be. Upon the same principle it is allowable for the jurymen, who are perhaps only moderately skilled in letters and words, to determine what the letters and characters are, and what word they make. The jurors may do this from the knowledge they already possess and such as they gain during the trial by the reading and comparison they make with other writings already introduced in evidence. Indeed, the court held in the opinion in this case

The rule in North Carolina and New York.

A North Carolina case has held that testimony as to handwriting founded on what is properly termed "comparison of hands" seems to be now generally exploded. Pope v. Askew, 1 Ired. L. 17; Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 143.

A comparison of the handwriting of papers introduced and relevant is permitted to ascertain the genuineness of the one in controversy. This rule was distinctly laid down in Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. & El. 514, and approved by the New York Court of Appeals in Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 442; and in a later case Mr. Commissioner Leonard, writing for affirmance, says: "The comparison of handwriting is permitted where different instruments relevant as to the controversy have been introduced for other purposes." Randolph v. Loughlin, 48 N. Y. 456.

The fluctuation in judicial opinion regarding this topic has been violent and contradictory and is several degrees removed from unanimity at this time.

The Maryland rule.

Maryland has adopted the English rule, which holds signatures to be proved under the common-law methods except in cases of comparison, by which is meant the collation of two papers in juxtaposition for the purpose of ascertaining by inspection if they were written by the same person. This rule was re-affirmed in 1876 in Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 30 Md. 93, which case is supposed to announce the prevailing view in that jurisdiction.

The Texas rule.

In Texas we find the usual aberrations from standard authorities. The judiciary of that State gave the matter the most exhaustive and discriminating review, and, after elaborate discussion of every apparent phase of the question, decided in favor of the old common-law rule, which prohibits proof of handwriting by comparison. Hanley v. Gandy, 28 Tex. 211.

Another case reported in the same volume sustains the same view. These decisions were received with such dissatisfaction as to place the court in serious embarrassment, and rather than recede from a position so deliberately assumed the Legislature was importuned and relief afforded by statutory enactment, which provides inter alia that it is competent in every case to give evidence of handwriting by comparison made by experts or by the jury. Paschall, Dig. art. 3122.

The rule as sanctioned by the Nebraska courts.

In Nebraska, it has been held that a witness not an expert cannot be permitted to give his opinion formed by a comparison of the disputed signature with the signatures of the party attached to pleadings filed in the case. In Missouri the case of Dow v. Spenny, 29 Mo. 337, is still regarded as controlling. The case appeared on appeal after the court below, in an action on a promissory note alleged to have been forged, had refused to allow a paper not in evidence to be used for the purposes of comparison in an appellate court. This ruling was affirmed. Scott, J., in writing for affirmance, says the evidence in relation to the comparison of handwriting was properly executed, as the fact did not bring the case within the rule as stated by Greenleaf.

The South Carolina rule.

In South Carolina the courts adhere with substantial unanimity to the decision announced in 1838 in the case of Boman v. Plunkett, 2 McCord, L. 518. That decision admits the principle of the English rule to be correct and comparison by juxtaposition, not as original but as confirmatory evidence, is indulged.

Theory of the Iowa and Indiana courts.

The cases of Clark v. Wyatt, 15 Ind. 271, and Shank v. Butsch, 28 Ind. 20, are supposed to embody and typify the English rule above referred to, although these decisions were subsequently repudiated. In Chance v. Indianapolis & W. G. R. Co. 32 Ind. 473, which was the controlling decision on the subject until 1877, when Chief Justice Biddell, ignoring all previous decisions relevant to the topic, announced the rule in Jones v. State that Mr. Lawson, in his work on Expert and Opinion Evidence, pronounces to be among the curiosities of legal literature.

An interesting résumé of the cases bearing upon this topic will be found in the opinion of the Indiana Supreme Court, reported in Forgey v. Cambridge First Nat. Bank, 66 Ind. 126.

The rule regulating this important topic has assumed a statutory form in the State of Iowa, and section 3655 of its present Code enacts that "evidence respecting handwriting may be given by comparison made by experts or by the jury of handwritings of the same person which are proved to be genuine." See also Baker v. Mygatt, 14 Iowa, 181.

The California code provisions on the subject.

The California Code of Civil Procedure, while at general term that the jury might compare the receipt in question with the dates and letters in the note and the other writings to determine the date of the receipt. If such comparison may be made by unskilled jurymen, why should they not be aided and enlightened, as they may be in analogous cases of the genuineness of handwriting, alterations and assimilations, by men who have made the subject of handwriting a study, and have obtained skill and proficiency in that branch of knowledge. As no objection was made that the witness was incompetent, it must be assumed that he was qualified as an expert to give his opinion, and the grounds of it, in aid of the jury. Van Wycklen v. Brooklyn, 118 N. Y. 424, 430, and the cases there cited; Masters v. Masters, 1 P. Wms. 425; Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 128.

If we analyze the practical processes which have to be gone through with in order to elicit and apply this kind of evidence, whether from experts or lay witnesses, we shall find that the witness is required to examine and determine what the letters and characters or even the hieroglyphics are, and what word they form in combination. The word thus formed may be in a native or foreign language; and, if it is foreign, then another process still is to be gone through with before it can reach the comprehension of the lay mind, and that is, to interpret its meaning into the native language of the juror. The testimony of expert witnesses frequently exemplifies one or both of these processes, and is of common use in the investigations carried on in courts of justice, and in other avocations. It often becomes necessary and pertinent in judicial proceedings to introduce foreign laws, and to interpret their meaning to the comprehension of the juror not familiar with the foreign language. We think these views are abundantly supported by adjudicated cases. In Sheldon v. Benham, 4 Hill, 129-131, a skilled bookkeeper was allowed to show the words indicated, and the meaning of adopting a variant phraseology, is in essence and spirit a substantial re-enactment of the above. Various provisions are enacted by which evidence may be introduced upon the trial, and among the facts to be proved and the evidentiary matter that may be introduced (subd. 9, § 1870) we find the following, inter alia: "The opinion of a witness respecting the identity of handwriting of a person where he has knowledge of the person or handwriting." The subdivision above quoted is a legislative enactment of a well-settled rule of common law. See also Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 549.

The New York rule is clear, concise and well authenticated. For fifty years the matter underwent a state of gestation and was subject to various vacillating rules which finally compelled legislative interference, and, in 1881, the matter crystallized into statutory form, which is believed to express and typify the ripest conclusions and ablest judicial judgments that have yet been given on this vexed and much controverted subject. The substance of the legislative enactment referred to will be found in chap. 36, Laws 1880, and under judicial constructions it has been held that the Act evidently was intended to enlarge the rules of evidence and extend the facilities of testing of handwriting of a party, the genuineness of whose signature was disputed beyond the opportunities afforded by the then existing rules. Peck v. Callaghan, 95 N. Y. 73.

The New York adjudications on the subject of comparison.

In this jurisdiction, the manifest tendency of the later decisions is toward a relaxation of the rigors of the early rule. These decisions concede that while documents could not be put in evidence for the purpose of comparison, yet, as in the English courts, those which were in for other purposes might be compared with the disputed signature by the jury (Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439; Randolph v. Loughlin, 48 N. Y. 456); and in a comparatively recent case Mr. Justice Davies, in the course of a singularly well-considered opinion, says: "A comparison of the handwriting of papers introduced and relevant is permitted to ascertain the genuineness of the one in controversy."

Attitude of the text-writers on the subject.

The contention sought to be established by the text have the support and authorization of the most approved writers on the Law of Evidence. "It cannot be denied," says Mr. Starkie (2 Starkie, 13 L. R. A.

Ev. p. 375), "that abstractly a witness is more likely to form a correct judgment as to the identity of handwriting by comparing it critically and minutely with a fair and genuine specimen of the party's handwriting than he would be able to make by comparing what he sees, with the faint impression made by having seen the party write but once, and then, perhaps, under circumstances which did not awaken his attention." "When other writings," says Prof. Greenleaf (Greenl. Ev. § 578), "admitted to be genuine, are already in the case here, comparison may be made by the jury with or without the aid of experts." See also 1 Phillips, Ev. 6th ed. 472; Evans' note of Pothier, Cont. 2 Evans' Pothier, p. 185.

The rule in the federal courts.

The law in the federal courts may be briefly stated. Comparison of hands has always been considered a legitimate mode of determining as to the authenticity of a signature. Judge Loring speaks of it as a method sanctioned in Medway's Case, 6 Ct. Cl. 421, and regards it as the law of the court. It would be more accurate to say it was adopted because found on examination to be the law of the land. See pp. 429, 432; also Henderson v. Hackney, 16 Ga. 521; McCorle v. Binns, 5 Binn. 349; Lyon v. Byman, 9 Conn. 55; Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 256; Homer v. Wallis, 11 Mass. 309; Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490; Richardson v. Newcomb, 21 Pick. 315; Chandler v. Le Barron, 45 Me. 534.

Returning to a consideration of the rule in the federal courts, the case of Moore v. United States, 91 U. S. 270, 23 L. ed. 346, in which this question was under review, furnishes some cautionary suggestions. Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the prevailing opinion, evidently intended to limit his remarks in their applicability to the case at bar, which involved the question, What rules of evidence should govern the action of the court of claims? The great majority of contracts and transactions which come before that court for adjudication are permeated, and are to be adjudged, by the principles of the common law. Where Congress has not provided, and no special reason demands, a different rule, the rules of evidence ought to govern the actions of the court of claims. If a more liberal rule is desirable, it is for Congress to declare it by proper enactment, but the general rule of the common law, disallowing a comparison of handwriting as proof of signature, has exceptions equally as well settled as the rule itself. One of these exceptions is, if a paper admitted to be the handwriting of a party or to have been subscribed by him, is in evicertain characters and abbreviations of entries made by a deceased officer of the bank. In the opinion in that case Judge Bronson says: "I see no objection to the testimony of the bookkeeper in relation to these memoranda. He was not called to give a construction or to declare the legal effect of a written instrument; but, as a person skilled in such matters, to tell the jury what words these short entries stood for. It is not unlike the case of an instrument written in a foreign tongue, where a translator may be called in to tell the jury how the instrument reads." "Where the difficulty arises from the obscurity of the writing itself, —e. g., if it be illegible from lapse of time, accident, etc.,—one skilled in deciphering may be called; as, for instance, a clerk from the postoffice. Gresley, Eq. Ev. 198, 199 (Phill. Ev. Cow. & H. notes) 1419." "The very point arose in Armstrong v. Burrows, 6 Watts, 266. There the parties on a trial in the common pleas differed about the date of a receipt which had been rendered illegible, the one contending that it was dated 1823, and the other that the date was 1824." In Vinton v. Peck, 14 Mich. 287-290, the question was whether the note was altered from "eight" to "eighty." An expert engraver was allowed to testify from comparison with the genuine writing whether an "8" was altered from a "3." In that case the court said: "It is very true that the jury may examine the paper for themselves, and that opinions are not usually admissible where the jury can form their own conclusions unaided. But we do not think it would be safe in this country to adopt a rule which assumes such a degree of knowledge and skill among jurors. Even reasonably expert writers may obtain valuable aid from opinions on such questions, and as neither law nor custom requires our jurors to meet any standard of education, we think that to exclude such aid would lead to absurd results. The most enlightened courts have dence for some other purpose in the cause, the signature may be compared with it by the jury. Moore v. United States, 91 U. S. 270, 23 L. ed. 346.

It is well settled that a witness who only knows a person's handwriting from seeing it in papers produced on the trial and proved or admitted to be his, will not be allowed from such knowledge to testify to that person's handwriting, unless the witness be an expert and the writing in question is of such antiquity that witnesses acquainted with the person's handwriting cannot be had. It is also the result of the weight of authority, that papers cannot be introduced in a cause for the mere purpose of enabling the jury to institute a comparison of handwriting, said papers not being competent for any other purpose. Greenl. Ev. § 5-9.

But where other writings admitted or proved to be genuine are properly in evidence for other purposes the handwriting of such instruments may be compared by the jury with that of the instrument or signature in question and its genuineness inferred from such comparison. Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cramp. & J. 47; Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. & El. 514; Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439; Miles v. Loomis, 75 N. Y. 238; Medway v. United States, 6 Ct. Cl. 421; McAllister v. McAllister, 7 B. Mon. 269; 1 Phill. Ev. 4th Am. ed. 615; Greenl. Ev. § 578.

The history of this last rule is well stated in Medway v. United States, supra.

In Griffith v. Williams, supra, it was stated by the court that, "where two documents are in evidence, it is competent for the court or jury to compare them. The rule as to the comparison of handwriting applies to witnesses who can only compare a writing to which they are examined with the character of the handwriting, impressed upon their own mind; but that rule does not apply to the court or jury, who may compare the two documents when they are properly in evidence. An authoritative statement of the rule is given by Justice Johnson in Van Wyck v. McIntosh, 14 N. Y. 439, decided in 1853. And from an extract in the opinion it appears, that in the French Code Napoleon, §§ 1223, 1224, there is an exclusion of all private writing not admitted to be genuine in the cause as a standard of comparison.

Of the change effected by the Texas Criminal Code.

The rule as above formulated is not contravened by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Texas, although it appears that the English rule does not obtain in that jurisdiction having been changed by the Code of Criminal Procedure (§ 67) but not in 12 L. R. A.

civil cases. Eborn v. Zimpelman, 47 Tex. 518. The leading case, however, applicable to this discussion is that of Hanley v. Gandy, 23 Tex. 211 (previously cited), which decided that other papers not connected with the cause cannot be introduced for the mere purpose of instituting a comparison of handwriting. No case decided that a signature to be proven cannot be compared by the jury with other papers or signatures of a party properly in evidence in the cause.

Strother v. Lucas, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 763, 8 L. ed. 573, the leading case in the United States Supreme Court, relates to the competency of a witness to testify as to the genuineness of a signature with any knowledge of the party's handwriting, and the court held that such evidence is not admissible.

Brief review of the English cases at nisi prius.

The nisi prius decisions of the English courts, although not in entire harmony (Allesbrook v. Roach, 1 Esp. 351), and much criticised by the text-writers, were generally hostile to the admission of comparison by experts, until by the Act of Parliament in 1854 such evidence was declared legitimate. Stanger v. Searle, 1 Esp. 14; Clermont v. Tullidge, 4 Car. & P. 1; Rex v. Cator, 4 Esp. 117.

Even, however, before the passage of that Act a jury were allowed themselves to institute the comparison, but only with documents in evidence before them and relevant to the issue. Doe v. Newton, 5 Ad. & El. 514; Solita v. Yarrow, 1 Moody & R. 183; Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cramp. & J. 47; Bromage v. Rice, 7 Car. & P. 543.

In Doe v. Suckermore, 5 Ad. & El. 703, the whole subject received very great consideration, four judges of the king's bench delivering elaborate opinions, reviewing the cases very fully, and discussing very thoroughly the principles upon which evidence of this character should be received or excluded. The rule seems to be conceded in that case by all the judges, that as to any but ancient writings, an opinion formed upon a mere comparison of hands at the trial, eo instanti, was not admissible, but they were equally divided upon the question whether a knowledge of the handwriting might be obtained by a skilled person, sufficient to render him a witness competent to speak as to the genuineness of the signature merely by a previous examination of other signatures shown to be genuine. Lord Chief Justice Denmon, Doe v. Webber, 1 Ad. & El. 737; Williams, J., Sadler v. Paefreyman, Id. 718.

This distinction is admitted to be subtle; but availed themselves of such assistance, and we deem it wise to use it in all cases where it is at hand. It can do no harm, and at all events must often be indispensable to justice." In the case of Stone v. Hubbard, 7 Cush. 595, it was held that in a case where the date of a note was doubtful, it being uncertain as to whether the last figure was a 4 or a 2, the plaintiff was entitled to call experts, and ask their opinion, "for the purpose of aiding the court or jury in arriving at a true reading of the document." Expert testimony upon the same subject as in this case, as to whether the figure was an 8 or a 3, was admitted in the case of Norman v. Morrell, 4 Ves. Jr. 770.

Having reached the conclusion that a new trial must be granted for the error in excluding the testimony of the expert, we do not express any opinion upon the other questions raised upon the appeal.

Judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

seems to have prevented the concurrence of these two judges with Coleridge and Patterson, JJ., in refusing the rule for a new trial.

Parliamentary legislation on the subject.

Str James Stephen has summarized the English rule relating to this topic with admirable preciseness, and article 52 of his celebrated Digest provides that comparison of the disputed handwriting or any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine is permitted to be made by witnesses, and such writings and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute. Mr. Chace in his valuable annotation of Stephen's Digest appends an exhaustive note at page 110, from which the want of harmony in the various jurisdictions of this country is quite apparent. The English rule, supra, has the ascendancy in all the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Mississippi, Texas, Ohio, Iowa and Kansas. In many States collateral and relevant writings cannot be introduced for comparison. Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 38; Houghton First Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 41 Mich. 709; Hasleton v. Columbus Union Bank, 32 Wis. 84; State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380; Brobston v. Cahill, 64 Ill. 354; Berres's Case, 27 Gratt. 946; Herriock v. Swomey, 56 Md. 439; Hawkins v. Grimes, 13 B. Mon. 260; Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 143.

Summary of the adjudications.

Summarizing the conclusions of authority, it may be affirmed that the rule forbidding proof of handwriting by comparison is gradually being abandoned by the States of this Union that once recognized it, until it is now retained in only sixteen States and in some of these is very much qualified by its exceptions. 1 Wharton, Ev. 717, and note; 1 Best, Ev. 459; 7 Starkie, Ev. 7th Am. ed. 716.

The practice, however, on this point, as the foregoing review will demonstrate, is hopelessly divergent. Homer v. Wallis, 11 Mass. 309.

But the better reason seems in favor of allowing the jury to compare. Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. 9, 23 Am. Dec. 540.

Comparison of hands may be made where other writings, admitted or clearly proved to be genuine, are already in evidence for some other purpose. United States v. Darnaud, 3 Wall. Jr. 181; *Bragg v. Experts may make comparison of a genuine signature with ancient writing in dispute when living witnesses cannot be had and such writing is not old enough to prove itself. Williams v. Drexel, supra; State v. Scott, 45 Mo. 303; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 460; Hicks v. Person, 19 Ohio, 439; Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 143; Van Sickle v. People, 29 Mich. 61; McAllister v. McAllister, 7 B. Mon. 270.

Genuineness of the standard must conclusively appear.

It remains to add that the standard must be proved clearly beyond a reasonable doubt in addition to what is necessary to admit the standard in evidence (Bragg v. Colwell, 10 Ohio St. 412; Outlaw v. Hurdle, 1 Jones, L. 150); and if there is any controversy as to the genuineness of the specimens they are excluded. Bowman v. Sanborn, 25 N. H. 96; Reed v. Spaulding, 43 N. H. 122; Com. v. Coe, 115 Mass. 431; Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225.

A distinction noted.

An important distinction must be observed in all cases, where comparison of handwriting becomes desirable. The rule does not apply and never did when a prima facie case has been made without it, or when the evidence is conflicting. It is only when comparison is relied on alone and by itself; but when comparison is resorted to in aid and corroboration of other competent evidence, or of doubtful proof, or when the evidence is conflicting, the rule is not violated. Benedict v. Flanigan, 13 S. C. 606, 44 Am. Rep. 533; Boman v. Plunkett, 2 McCord, L. 513; Travis v. Brown, supra; Baker v. Haines, 6 Whart. 234, 36 Am. Dec. 235; Myers v. Toscan, 3 N. H. 43; Gore v. Stevens, 1 Dana, 201, 25 Am. Dec. 141; Woodard v. Spiller, 1 Dana, 180; Smith v. Fenner, 1 Gall. 175; Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490.

Returning to the contentions sought to be established in the principal case, it may be well to remind the practitioner that the trial court will, without proof, determine the meaning of the customary abbreviation of Christian names (Gordon v. Holliday, 1 Wash. C. C. 239; Weaver v. McElhenon, 13 Mo. 90; Stephen v. State, 11 Ga. 241); the names of offices (Moseley v. Martin, 37 Ala. 221); names of places (Ellis v. Park, 8 Tex. 206; Russell v. Martin, 15 Tex. 238); and common words. Jagua v. Witham & A. Co. 4 West. Rep. 715, 106 Ind. 547; 2 Wharton, Ev. 1003; Best, Ev. 232, 232.

The implications of the above paragraph favor the familiar doctrine that courts will take judicial notice of such well-recognized abbreviations as custom and usage have for a long period sanctioned; and for the authorities sustaining the general proposition as to judicial notice, reference is made to a note appended to the case of Olive v. State, 4 L. R. A. 33, 36 Ala. 33.

1. A minor's abstinence from intoxicating liquors and tobacco, and from swearing or playing cards or billiards for money, is a good consideration for a promise by his uncle to pay him a sum of money.

2. A trust is created by a letter from an uncle to a nephew who had written to claim a sum of money, acknowledging that the nephew had earned it, and saying, "I had the money in the bank the day you were twenty-one years old that I intended for you," and, "I don't intend to interfere with the money in any way until I think you are capable of taking care of it,"—then adding in a postscript, "You can consider the money on interest."

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of the Chemung Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a claim against the estate of William D. Story, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Parker, J.:

Appeal from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the Fourth Judicial Department, reversing a judgment entered on the decision of the court at special term in the county clerk's office of Chemung County on the 1st day of October, 1889. The plaintiff presented a claim to the executor of William E. Story, Sr., for $5,000 and interest from the 6th day of February, 1875. She acquired it through several mesne assignments from William E. Story, 2d. The claim being rejected by the executor, this action was brought. It appears that William E. Story, Sr., was the uncle of William E. Story, 2d; that at the celebration of the golden wedding of Samuel Story and wife, father and mother of William E. Story, Sr., on the 20th day of March, 1869, in the presence of the family and invited guests, he promised his nephew that if he would refrain from drinking, using tobacco, swearing and playing cards or billiards for money until he became twenty-one years of age, he would pay him the sum of $5,000. The nephew assented thereto, and fully performed the conditions inducing the promise. When the nephew arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and on the 31st day of January, 1875, he wrote to his uncle, informing him that he had performed his part of the agreement, and had thereby become entitled to the sum of $5,000. The uncle received the letter, and a few days later, and on the 6th day of February, he wrote and mailed to his nephew the following letter:

"Buffalo, Feb. 6, 1875.

"W. E. Story, Jr.

"Dear Nephew: Your letter of the 31st ult. came to hand all right, saying that you had

This was a contract to prevent further litigation respecting real estate. For a history of the case, see Ludlum v. Buckingham, 35 N. J. Eq. 71, on appeal 39 N. J. Eq. 563.

A promise is a good consideration for a promise, but they must be mutual and concurrent, so that they create a reciprocity of obligation, and when that is the case they constitute as perfect a consideration as a contract can have. 1 Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 50; 1 Parsons, Cont. 477; *Buckingham v. lived up to the promise made to me several years ago. I have no doubt but you have, for which you shall have five thousand dollars, as I promised you. I had the money in the bank the day you was twenty-one years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain. Now, Willie, I do not intend to interfere with this money in any way till I think you are capable of taking care of it, and the sooner that time comes the better it will please me. I would hate very much to have you start out in some adventure that you thought all right and lose this money in one year. The first five thousand dollars that I got together cost me a heap of hard work. You would hardly believe me when I tell you that to obtain this I shoved a jack-plane many a day, butchered three or four years, then came to this city, and, after three months' perseverance, I obtained a situation in a grocery store. I opened this store early, closed late, slept in the fourth story of the building in a room thirty by forty feet, and not a human being in the building but myself. All this I done to live as cheap as I could to save something. I don't want you to take up with this kind of fare. I was here in the cholera season of '49 and '52, and the deaths averaged 80 to 125 daily, and plenty of small-pox. I wanted to go home, but Mr. Fisk, the gentleman I was working for, told me, if I left them, after it got healthy he probably would not want me. I stayed. All the money I have saved I know just how I got it. It did not come to me in any mysterious way, and the reason I speak of this is that money got in this way stops longer with a fellow that gets it with hard knocks than it does when he finds it. Willie, you are twenty-one, and you have many a thing to learn yet. This money you have earned much easier than I did, besides acquiring good habits at the same time, and you are quite welcome to the money. Hope you will make good use of it. I was ten long years getting this together after I was your age. Now, hoping this will be satisfactory, I stop. One thing more. Twenty-one years ago I bought you fifteen sheep. These sheep were put out to double every four years. I kept track of them the first eight years. I have not heard much about them since. Your father and grandfather promised me that they would look after them till you were of age. Have they done so? I hope they have. By this time you have between five and six hundred sheep, worth a nice little income this spring. Willie, I have said much more than I expected to. Hope you can make out what I have written. To day is the seventeenth day that I have not been out of my room, and have had the doctor as many days. Am a little better to day. Think I will get out next week. You need not mention to father, as he always worries about small matters.

"Truly yours,

"W. E. Story."

"P. S. You can consider this money on interest."

The nephew received the letter, and thereafter consented that the money should remain with his uncle in accordance with the terms and conditions of the letter. The uncle died on the 29th day of January, 1887, without having paid over to his nephew any portion of the said $5,000 and interest.

A naked promise, after a contract has been entered into, is without consideration and cannot be enforced. Little v. Rees, 34 Minn. 277.

No action can be maintained to enforce a gratuitous promise, however worthy the object intended to be promoted. First Presby. Church v. Cooper, 3 L. R. A. 468, 112 N. Y. 517; Plunkett v. Black, 117 Ind. 14; Pfeiffer v. Campbell, 111 N. Y. 681; Clark v. Jones, 85 Ala. 127.

A promise to pay a niece for services in one's family, made after she had married and left the family, is void for want of consideration. Robinson v. McAfee, 59 Mich. 375.

A promise by a husband to his wife on her deathbed that their son should have certain property, does not constitute a valuable consideration for a conveyance by him to the son. Peek v. Peek, 1 L. R. A. 185, 77 Cal. 106.

Past act a sufficient consideration.

A past act, if done at the request of the promisor, furnishes sufficient consideration for a present promise. Trine v. Williamson (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 667.

A by-gone act or service rendered pursuant to a previous request of the promisor is sufficient to sustain an action on a promise. 1 Chitty, Cont. 66; Dyer, 272, note b; Carman v. Noble, 9 Pa. 371.

But a mere voluntary act will not support an action.

Voluntary service or labor done without the privity or consent of the defendant, however beneficial to him, in saving his property from destruction by fire, will not support a promise. Bartolomew v. Jackson, 20 Johns. 23.

Any act done for the benefit of another, without his request, is to be deemed a voluntary act, for which no action can be sustained, unless after 12 L. R. A.

An agreement by a father with the future husband of his illegitimate daughter, to settle, at his, the father's, death, his "whole estate" upon the husband, in consideration of the marriage, is valid, and will bind the property belonging to the father at the time of his death. Wall v. Scales, 1 Dev. Eq. 472.

A verbal promise made by a father to the husband of his daughter before his marriage, to convey certain land to him, is a sufficient consideration for a written agreement for that purpose after the marriage. Argenbright v. Campbell, 3 Hen. & M. 144.

If a father promises A that if he will marry his daughter, he will give a certain amount as a marriage portion, and A afterwards marries the daughter, the father will be bound by the promise. Ogden v. Ogden, 1 Bland. Ch. 284.

Mr. H. J. Swift, for appellant:

A sufficient consideration to support a promise is found where there is "any advantage to the person promising, or any damage, inconvenience, liability or charge to the person to whom the promise is made."

9 Alb. L. J. 828.

Also where there is "the waiver of any legal right at the request of another."

1 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. 448.

Also where there is "anything that may be detrimental to the promisor or beneficial to the promisee."

Freeman v. Freeman, 48 N. Y. 84.

Also where there is a benefit to one or harm to another.

Haden v. Buddenstok, 4 Hun. 649.

In short, where you have mutual and concurrent promises, each is a good consideration for the other if any benefit may be received by the promisor or any inconvenience suffered on the part of the promisee because of the promises or either of them.

It was beneficial for the uncle in the case at bar to have his nephew refrain from drinking and smoking until he should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, to the end that he might form proper habits and reflect credit upon the name of the uncle, which he bore, as well as give satisfaction, sense of pride and feelings of pleasure to that uncle. This being so, the benefit to the uncle furnishes a sufficient consideration to uphold his promise.

Lakota v. Newton (Mass.) an unreported case; Talbot v. Stemmons (Ky.) 5 L. R. A. 856.

The deprivation on the part of the promisee need not be a thing of substance.

Johnson v. Titus, 2 Hill, 606.

The consideration for the promise in the letter is sufficient in law, because it was but the performance of the original promise which the uncle made, which was a sufficient consideration to support the promise in the letter, and a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration to support a promise if founded on a prior equitable claim.

Bentley v. Moree, 14 Johns. 468; Scouton v. Bistord, 7 Johns. 86; Cameron v. Fowler, 5 Hill, 806; Goulding v. Davidson, 26 N. H. 604; Sternbergh v. Provoost, 18 Barb. 865; Proseus v. McIntyre, 5 Barb. 424; Comstock v. Smith, 7 Johns. 86.

When, at the desire of the promisor, the promisee or any other person has done or abstained from doing, or does or abstains from doing, or promises to do or abstain from doing, something, such act or abstinence or promise is called a consideration for the promise.

1 Addison, Cont. * 2, 5, 6.

A valuable consideration is one that is either a benefit to the party promising or some trouble or prejudice to the party to whom the promise is made. Any damage or suspension or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise. A mutual promise amounts to a with the rest of his daughters, as fast as it is in his power with convenience," and the marriage be afterwards had with his consent, the promise is sufficiently certain and obligatory. Chichester v. Vass, 1 Munf. 98.

Such promise is to the husband and wife jointly, not to be satisfied by a conveyance of land to the wife alone; but the husband may elect to consider it a personal contract, and, if he survives his wife, sue thereon in his own name. Ibid.

A promised B if he would get himself a wife and have a child, he would give him $500. In an action by B to recover this sum from the executor of A, the promise was held to be supported by a good consideration. Gurvin v. Cromartie, 11 Ired. L. 174.

Good consideration, instances.

Natural affection is a good consideration. King v. Thompson, 84 U. S. 9 Pet. 204, 9 L. ed. 102.

A compromise for a doubtful claim is a good consideration for a promise. Chamberlain v. Winn (Wash. Terr.) Jan. 20, 1890.

A contract made in a compromise of differences in regard to the rights of the parties under a former contract, with regard to the construction of which they were not agreed, was held to be founded upon a good consideration. Richardson v. Independent Dist. of Hampton, 70 Iowa, 573.

A settlement and discontinuance of a prosecution for bastardy and fornication is a good and legal consideration for a judgment note given by the reputed father to the mother of the child. Stumpf's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 113, 116 Pa. 33.

Where a man having a legal wife deceives another woman by a void marriage, and has children by her, the facts furnish a good consideration for the assignment to her of a mortgage security. Gay v. Parpart, 108 U. S. 679, 27 L. ed. 256, 13 L. R. A.

An agreement, in a conveyance, to perform certain services for the grantors, during the life of themselves and their survivor, and an executed life lease of lands to the grantors, constitute a good consideration for a conveyance. Gardner v. Lightfoot, 71 Iowa, 577.

A promissory note given by a defaulting outgoing county treasurer, to his successor, upon condition that action should not be brought on his official bond, is supported by a good consideration. Sac County v. Hobbs, 72 Iowa, 66. See note to First Presby. Church v. Cooper (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 468.

Benefit to promisor and detriment to promisee is sufficient.

A consideration sufficient to support a contract may be defined to be either a benefit accruing to the promisor, or a loss or disadvantage sustained by the promisee. Day v. Gardner, 5 Cent. Rep. 631, 42 N. J. Eq. 199.

Any benefit to defendant or detriment to plaintiff is a sufficient consideration. Given v. Corae, 3 West. Rep. 580, 20 Mo. App. 132; Waterman v. Barrett, 4 Harr. (Del.) 811; Harrington v. Wells, 12 Vt. 508; Columbus v. Columbus St. R. Co. 10 West. Rep. 440, 45 Ohio St. 98; Story, Cont. § 548; 1 Parsons Cont. 7th ed. 473; Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & El. 428; Southall v. Rigg, 11 C. B. 481; Haigh v. Brooks, 10 Ad. & El. 309; Shortrade v. Cheek, 1 Ad. & El. 57.

A consideration to support a promise need not enure to the promisor; it is sufficient if it consists in a detriment to the person to whom the promise is made. New Hanover Bank v. Bridgers, 98 N. C. 67; Churchill v. Bradley, 2 New Eng. Rep. 491, 33 Vt. 408.

It is not essential that a person to whom the consideration of a promise moves should be benefited sufficient consideration, provided the mutual promises be concurrent in point of time, and, in that case, the one promise is a good consideration for the other.

2 Kent, Com. Holmes' 12th ed. 485; Haigh v. Brooks, 4 Per. & D. 288; Smith v. Smith, 13 C. B. N. S. 439; Westlake v. Adams, 5 C. B. N. S. 247; Wilkinson v. Oliveira, 1 Scott, 461; Farmer v. Stewart, 2 N. H. 97; Harlan v. Harlan, 20 Pa. 808; Perry v. Buckman, 83 Vt. 7.

The letter interpreted by surrounding circumstances established a trust and made the uncle the self-appointed trustee of the $5,000.

Gray v. Barton, 55 N. Y. 68; Day v. Roth, 18 N. Y. 448; Fulton v. Fulton, 48 Barb. 581; Taylor v. Kelly, 5 Hun, 115; White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 505; Re Collyer, 4 Dem. 24; Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134; Mabie v. Bailey, 95 N. Y. 206.

If the uncle did not constitute himself a trustee by the letter he certainly made himself a depository of the money which belonged to the nephew, and if this is so the plaintiff is just as much entitled to recover as though the uncle had made himself a trustee, for the only bearing which the trusteeship has upon the question is as to whether the Statute of Limitations applies or not. This money was not so due as to fall within the rule established in Wenman v. Mohawk Ins. Co. 18 Wend. 268.

In cases where the instrument is silent as to the time of payment, the court will refer to extrinsic facts to ascertain whether it was the intention of the parties to make the money payable on demand or after demand, presently or by-and-bye.

Mr. Adelbert Moot, for respondent:

There is no consideration to support the promise to pay the nephew $5,000. If the nephew was required to do something that would injure him, or something that would benefit the uncle, and did so with the assent of his father, then there would be a consideration for the payment of the $5,000. Simply failing to play cards or billiards for money, or drink liquor, or use tobacco, would not benefit the uncle, would not, and did not, injure the nephew.

The Statute has long made it a crime to sell liquor to such boys, or to provide gambling places for them; and the law now goes further and makes it a crime to furnish tobacco in any of its forms to any child under sixteen.

Laws 1889, chap. 170, p. 201.

A promise of a boy not to commit murder would not sustain an agreement to pay money, nor would the promise of a boy to refrain from immoral habits, as keeping a mistress, sustain an uncle's promise to pay him money. Otherwise, notes given by men to recompense a mistress for past or future cohabitation would be valid, while the law is well settled that they are invalid.

Leaving out of question the infancy of William E. Story, 2d, and treating him as an adult, clearly his agreement to abstain was one which the courts could not enforce,—was an agreement which he could break with impunity, because no court would fix damages for the breach thereof.

Of course, nominal damages might be fixed for the breach thereof, but it has long been settled that nominal damages are not enough.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question which provoked the most discussion by counsel on this appeal, and which lies at the foundation of plaintiff's asserted right of recovery, is whether, by virtue of a contract, defendant's testator, William E. Story, became indebted to his nephew, William E. Story, 2d, on his twenty-first birthday in the sum of $5,000. The trial court found as a fact that "on the 20th day of March, 1869,

William E. Story agreed to and with William E. Story, 2d, that if he would refrain from drinking liquor, using tobacco, swearing and playing cards or billiards for money until he should become twenty-one years of age, then he, the said William E. Story, would at that time pay him, the said William E. Story, 2d, the sum of $5,000 for such refraining, to which the said William E. Story, 2d, agreed," and that he "in all things fully performed his part of said agreement." The defendant contends that the contract was without consideration to support it, and therefore invalid. He asserts that the promisee, by refraining from the use of liquor and tobacco, was not harmed, but benefited; that that which he did was best for him to do, independently of his uncle's promise,—and insists that it follows that, unless the promisor was benefited, the contract was without consideration,—a contention which, if well founded, would seem to leave open for controversy in many cases whether that which the promisee did or omitted to do was in fact of such benefit to him as to leave no consideration to support the enforcement of the promisor's agreement. Such a rule could not be tolerated, and is without foundation in the law.

The exchequer chamber in 1875 defined "consideration" as follows: "A valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist either in some right, interest, profit or benefit accruing to the one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss or responsibility given, suffered or undertaken by the other." Courts "will not ask whether the thing which forms the consideration does in fact benefit the promisee or a third party, or is of any substantial value to anyone. It is enough that something is promised, done, forbore or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made as consideration for the promise made to him." Anson, Cont.

68. "In general a waiver of any legal right at the request of another party is a sufficient consideration for a promise." Parsons, Cont. *444. "Any damage, or suspension, or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise." 2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. *465. Pollock, in his work on Contracts (p. 166), after citing the definition given by the exchequer chamber, already quoted, says: "The second branch of this judicial description is really the most important one. 'Consideration' means not so much that one party is profiting as that the other abandons some legal right in the present, or limits his legal freedom of action in the future, as an inducement for the promise of the first." Now, applying this rule to the facts before us, the promisee used tobacco, occasionally drank liquor, and he had a legal right to do so. That right he abandoned for a period of years upon the strength of the promise of the testator that for such forbearance he would give him $5,000. We need not speculate on the effort which may have been required to give up the use of those stimulants. It is sufficient that he restricted his lawful freedom of action within certain prescribed limits upon the faith of his uncle's agreement, and now having fully performed the conditions imposed, it is of no moment whether such performance actually proved a benefit to the promisor, and the court will not inquire into it; but, were it a proper subject of inquiry, we see nothing in this record that would permit a determination that the uncle was not benefited in a legal sense. Few cases have been found which may be said to be precisely in point, but such as have been support the position we have taken. In Shadwell v. Shadwell, 9 C. B. N. S. 159, an uncle wrote to his nephew as follows: "My dear Lancey: I am so glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl, and, as I promised to assist you at starting, I am happy to tell you that I will pay you 150 pounds yearly during my life and until your annual income derived from your profession of a chancery barrister shall amount to 600 guineas, of which your own admission will be the only evidence that I shall receive or require. Your affectionate uncle, Charles Shadwell." It was held that the promise was binding, and made upon good consideration. In Lakota v. Newton (an unreported case in the superior court of Worcester, Mass.), the complaint averred defendant's promise that: "if you [meaning the plaintiff] will leave off drinking for a year I will give you $100," plaintiff's assent thereto, performance of the condition by him, and demanded judgment therefor. Defendant demurred, on the ground, among others, that the plaintiff's declaration did not allege a valid and sufficient consideration for the agreement of the defendant. The demurrer was overruled. In Talbott v. Stemmons, (Ky.) 5 L. R. A. 856 (a Kentucky case, not yet officially reported), the step-grandmother of the plaintiff made with him the following agreement: "I do promise and bind myself to give my grandson Albert R. Talbott $500 at my death if he will never take another chew of tobacco or smoke another cigar during my life, from this date up to my death; and if he breaks this pledge he is to refund double the

An agreement by a father, that if his daughter-in-law will pay an indebtedness due him from his deceased son, whose estate is at the time solvent and the indebtedness collectible, he will give her a life lease of certain premises, is void for want of consideration. Dunkel v. Dunkel, 56 Hun. 25.

A promise by a party to save a witness harmless as to a forfeiture for failing, at a former term, to attend, on condition of his attending at the next term, is without consideration and void. Sweeney v. Hunter, 1 Murph. 181.

A promise by a father to give his son a tract of land by his will, followed by expenditure in improvements, not, however, in execution of the contract or at the father's request, is without consideration, and cannot be enforced. McClure v. McClure, 1 Pa. 374.

A, being wealthy and childless, verbally promised his brother B, who was poor and with many children, that if he would not remove to the west country, but would move to and settle on a lot of land of A, he would convey it to him. B accepted the offer, and took possession of the land. It was held that the promise was not supported by either a valuable or meritorious consideration, and would not be enforced specifically against the heirs of B. Reed v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh. 562.

Performance of a legal obligation is no consideration.

The performance of an act which the party is under a legal obligation to perform cannot constitute a consideration for a new contract. Robinson v. Jewett, 118 N. Y. 40; Dennis v. Piper, 21 Ill. App. 169.

A promise to pay a debt for which the promisor is already bound does not constitute a consideration sufficient to support a contract. Harris v. Casaday, 5 West. Rep. 226, 107 Ind. 158, citing Laboyteaux v. Swigart, 1 West. Rep. 562, 103 Ind. 596; Smith 12 L. R. A.

v. Boruff, 75 Ind. 412; Fensier v. Prather, 40 Ill. 119; Ritenour v. Mathews, 43 Ind. 7; Reynolds v. Nugent, 23 Ind. 328; Robinson v. Jewett, supra.

An agreement to pay that which a party has already contracted to pay does not constitute a consideration for a new promise to perform the same contract. Widman v. Brown, 88 Mich. 241.

Contract founded on illegal consideration is void.

A contract founded on an act which is prohibited by statute, under a penalty, is void. Milton v. Haden, 33 Ala. 30.

A contract in violation of the statute imposing a penalty for the sale of goods by unsealed scales or measure is void. Blabee v. McAllen, 39 Minn. 143.

An entire contract, which is founded upon a consideration in part illegal is void, and incapable of confirmation. Pettit v. Pettit, 33 Ala. 238.

That a person executed a note given on an illegal consideration, with full knowledge of all the facts, is of no moment. The defense he makes is not allowed for his sake, but to maintain the policy of the law. Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 33 L. ed. 172.

Immoral consideration renders contract void.

Agreements entered into with a view to future cohabitation and prostitution are illegal and void, as being against public morality. Walker v. Perkins, 3 Burr. 1568, 1 W. Bl. 517; Friend v. Harrison, 2 Car. & P. 584.

A warrant of attorney, given to induce a plaintiff to live in prostitution with the defendant, is void, and will be decreed to be given up. James v. Hoskins, 1 Tidd, Pr. 647.

But an agreement by defendant to allow plaintiff, with whom he cohabited, in case they should separate, an annuity for life, provided she should amount to his mother." The executor of Mrs. Stemmons demurred to the complaint on the ground that the agreement was not based on a sufficient consideration. The demurrer was sustained, and an appeal taken therefrom to the court of appeals, where the decision of the court below was reversed. In the opinion of the court it is said that "the right to use and enjoy the use of tobacco was a right that belonged to the plaintiff, and not forbidden by law. The abandonment of its use may have saved him money, or contributed to his health; nevertheless, the surrender of that right caused the promise, and, having the right to contract with reference to the subject matter, the abandonment of the use was a sufficient consideration to uphold the promise." Abstinence from the use of intoxicating liquors was held to furnish a good consideration for a promissory note in Lindell v. Rokes, 60 Mo. 249. The cases cited by the defendant on this question are not in point. In Mallory v. Gillett, 31 N. Y. 412; Bellnap v. Bender, 75 N. Y. 446, and Berry v. Brown, 107 N. Y. 659, 9 Cent. Rep. 896,—the promise was in contravention of that provision of the Statute of Frauds which declares void all promises to answer for the debts of third persons unless reduced to writing. In Beaumont v. Reeve, 8 Q. B. 483, Shirl. Lead. Cas. 7, and Porterfield v. Butler, 47 Miss. 165, the question was whether a moral obligation furnishes sufficient consideration to uphold a subsequent express promise. In Duvoll v. Wilson, 9 Barb. 437, and Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 192, 6 Cent. Rep. 214, the proposition involved was whether an executory covenant against incumbrances in a deed given in consideration of natural love and affection could be enforced. In Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392, the plaintiff contracted with defendant to build a house, agreeing to accept in part payment therefor a specific bond and mortgage. Afterwards he refused to finish his contract unless the defendant would guarantee its payment, which was done. It was held that the guaranty could not be enforced for want of consideration, for in building the house the plaintiff only did that which he had contracted to do. And in Robinson v. Jewett, 116 N. Y. 40, the court simply held that "the performance of an act which the party is under a legal obligation to perform cannot constitute a consideration for a new contract." It will be observed that the agreement which we have been considering was within the condemnation of the Statute of Frauds, because not to be performed within a year, and not in writing. But this defense the promisor could waive, and his letter and oral statements subsequent to the date of final performance on the part of the promisee must be held to amount to a waiver. Were it otherwise, the Statute could not now be invoked in aid of the defendant. It does not appear on the face of the complaint that the agreement is one prohibited by the Statute of Frauds, and therefore such defense could not be made available unless set up in the answer. Porter v. Wormser, 94 N. Y. 431, 450. This was not done.

In further consideration of the questions presented, then, it must be deemed established continue single, is a valid agreement. Gibson v. Dickie, 3 Mauls. & S. 463.

A bond given in consideration of past cohabitation is good. Hill v. Spencer, Ambli. 641; Knye v. Moore, 3 Sim. & Stu. 220; Turner v. Vaughan, 2 Will. 339; Nye v. Moseley, 9 D. & R. 165. 6 Barn. & C. 123; Gray v. Matthias, 5 Ves. Jr. 236; Hall v. Palmer, 8 Jur. 459, 13 L. J. Ch. 353.

But a bond for cohabitation with a woman seduced by the obligor, and for maintenance after his death, is void. Walker v. Perkins, 3 Burr. 1568, 1 W. Bl. 517.

Past seduction and cohabitation are not a good consideration to support a grant of an annuity. Beaumont v. Reeve, 8 Q. B. 483, 13 Jur. 234, 15 L. J. Q. B. 141.

Where a complaint stated that the plaintiff had cohabited with defendant as his mistress, and that it was agreed that no further immoral connection should take place between them, and that defendant should allow her an annuity as long as she should continue of good and virtuous life and demeanor, it was held that there was no good consideration, it not being averred that defendant was the seducer, and that there is no authority to show that past cohabitation alone, or the ceasing to cohabit in the future, is a good consideration for such a promise. Binnington v. Wallis, 4 Barn. & Ald. 660.

Moral obligation as a consideration.

The abandonment of the use of tobacco by one party during the life of the promisor is a sufficient consideration for the promise to pay an agreed sum of money. See note to Talbot v. Stemmon (Ky.), 15 L. R. A. 355.

The Code of Georgia (§ 2741) expressly recognizes a strong moral obligation as a consideration for a contract; and there is no reason for confining this to executed contracts. But according to the common law as now generally understood and administered, such an obligation would not suffice as a consideration for an executory promise. Gray v. Hamil, 32 Ga. 386; Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. § 2 et seq.; Wharton, Cont. §§ 512, 514; Blishop, Cont. § 44; Hare, Cont. 232 et seq.; Lampleigh v. Brathwait, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 151, nota.

An agreement by one partner, who had, by excessive use of stimulants, become voluntarily disabled from service for the firm, made after dissolution but before full settlement, to allow his co-partner out of the assets a certain sum for past services, to compensate him for his own lack of services, is supported by a strong moral obligation which renders it valid under Ga. Code, § 2741, although it would not be valid at common law. Gray v. Hamil, 6 L. R. A. 72, 32 Ga. 375.

A deed made by a father for the benefit of his illegitimate child is upon a good consideration. Conley v. Nailor, 118 U. S. 127, 30 L. ed. 112; Gay v. Parpart, 106 U. S. 679, 27 L. ed. 256; Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. 329, 1 L. ed. 159; Hook v. Pratt, 78 N. Y. 371; Annandale v. Harris, 3 P. Wms. 433; Jennings v. Brown, 9 Mees. & W. 493.

Neither "love and affection," nor "blood relationship," nor "friendship," nor any mere moral duty or obligation, nor any voluntary courtesy, constitutes a sufficient consideration for a promise not under seal. Vance v. Wells, 8 Ala. 399; Montgomery v. Lampton, 3 Met. (Ky.) 519; Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 67; Loomis v. Newhall, 15 Pick. 159; Hawley v. Farrar, 1 Vt. 420; Updike v. Titus, 13 N. J. Eq. 151; Musser v. Ferguson, 56 Pa. 475; Cobb v. Cowdrey, 40 Vt. 25; Shepherd v. Rhodes, 7 R. I. 470; Glass v. Beach, 5 Vt. 173; Canal Fund Comrs. v. Perry, 5 Ohio, 58; Turner v. Patridge, 3 Pa. 172; Barlow v. Smith, 4 Vt. 144; Clark v. Herring, 5 Binn. 33; Dodge v. Adams, 19 for the purposes of this appeal that on the 31st day of January, 1875, defendant's testator was indebted to William E. Story, 2d, in the sum of $5,000, and, if this action were founded on that contract, it would be barred by the Statute of Limitations, which has been pleaded, but on that day the nephew wrote to his uncle as follows:

"Dear Uncle: I am 31 years old to day, and I am now my own boss; and I believe, according to agreement, that there is due me $5,000. I have lived up to the contract to the letter in every sense of the word."

A few days later, and on February 6, the uncle replied, and, so far as it is material to this controversy, the reply is as follows:

"Dear Nephew: Your letter of the 31st ult. came to hand all right, saying that you had lived up to the promise made to me several years ago. I have no doubt but you have, for which you shall have $5,000, as I promised you. I had the money in the bank the day you was 21 years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain. Now, Willie, I don't intend to interfere with this money in any way until I think you are capable of taking care of it, and the sooner that time comes the better it will please me. I would hate very much to have you start out in some adventure that you thought all right, and lose this money in one year. . . . This money you have earned much easier than I did, besides acquiring good habits at the same time; and you are quite welcome to the money. Hope you will make good use of it."

W. E. Story.

"P. S. You can consider this money on interest."

The trial court found as a fact that "said letter was received by said William E. Story, 2d, who thereafter consented that said money should remain with the said William E. Story in accordance with the terms and conditions of said letter," and further, "that afterwards, on the 1st day of March, 1877, with the knowledge and consent of his said uncle, he duly sold, transferred and assigned all his right, title and interest in and to said sum of $5,000 to his wife, Libbie H. Story, who thereafter duly sold, transferred and assigned the same to the plaintiff in this action." We must now consider the effect of the letter and the nephew's assent thereto. Were the relations of the parties thereafter that of debtor and creditor simply, or that of trustee and cestui que trust? If the former, then this action is not maintainable, because barred by lapse of time. If the latter, the result must be otherwise. No particular expressions are necessary to create a trust. Any language clearly showing the settler's intention is insufficient if the property and disposition of it are definitely stated. Lewin, Tr. 55. A person in the legal possession of money or property acknowledging a trust with the assent of the cestui que trust becomes from that time a trustee if the acknowledgment be founded on a valuable consideration. His antecedent relation to the subject, whatever it may have been, no longer controls. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 973. If before a declaration of trust a party be a mere debtor, a subsequent agreement recognizing the fund as already in his hands, and stipulating for its investment on the creditor's account, will have the effect to create a trust. Day v. Roth, 18 N. Y. 448. It is essential that the letter, interpreted in the light of surrounding circumstances, must show an intention on the part of the uncle to become a trustee before he will be held to have become such; but in an effort to ascertain the construction which should be given to it we are also to observe the rule that the language of the promisor is to be interpreted in the sense in which he had reason to suppose it was understood by the promisee. White v. Hoyt, 78 N. Y. 505, 511. At the time the uncle wrote the letter he was indebted to his nephew in the sum of $5,000, and payment had been requested. The uncle, recognizing the indebtedness, wrote the nephew that he would keep the money until he deemed him capable of taking care of it. He did not say, "I will pay you at some other time," or use language that would indicate that the relation of debtor and creditor would continue. On the contrary, his language indicated that he had set apart the money the nephew had "earned" for him, so that when he should be capable of taking care of it he should receive it with interest. He said: "I had the money in the bank the day you were twenty-one years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain." That he had set apart the money is further evidenced by the next sentence: "Now, Willie, I don't intend to interfere with this money in any way until I think you are capable of taking care of it." Certainly the uncle must have intended that his nephew should understand that the promise not "to interfere with this money" referred to the money in the bank, which he declared was not only there when the nephew became twenty-one

A mere moral obligation or duty, as an executed consideration, is not a sufficient consideration to support a subsequent express promise to pay. Condon v. Barr, 4 Cent. Rep. 558, 49 N. J. L. 58; Kent v. Rand, 2 New Eng. Rep. 800, 64 N. H. 45.

But the duty of a father is a sufficient consideration to support the gift of land by him to a third person for the benefit of his daughter; and such gift cannot thereafter be revoked or altered without the consent of the daughter. Knowles v. Erwin, 43 Hun, 150.

But the natural affection of the father, and his moral obligation and duty to provide for a bastard child, do not constitute a sufficient consideration to make him liable for its support, where there was 12 L. R. A.

no compromise with the mother or any demand by her for a verbal promise to provide for the child. Mercer v. Mercer, 87 Ky. 30.

A promise by the father of an illegitimate child to the mother to pay her an annuity if she would maintain the child, is founded on sufficient consideration. Jennings v. Brown, 9 Mees. & W. 493, 12 L. J. Exch. 86; Hicks v. Gregory, 8 C. B. 373, 13 Jur. 1030, 19 L. J. C. P. 84; Smith v. Roche, 6 C. B. N. S. 223, 5 Jur. N. S. 918, 24 L. J. C. P. 237.

A bond to pay an annuity to the mother of an illegitimate child, executed by the father, on condition that she should not require their custody or management, is given on good consideration. Re Flaskett, 30 L. J. Ch. 808, 9 Week. Rep. 623, 4 L. T. N. S. 544.

years old, but was intended for him. True, he did not use the word "trust," or state that the money was deposited in the name of William E. Story, 3d, or in his own name in trust for him, but the language used must have been intended to assure the nephew that his money had been set apart for him, to be kept without interference until he should be capable of taking care of it, for the uncle said in substance and in effect: "This money you have earned much easier than I did. . . . You are quite welcome to the money. I had it in the bank the day you were twenty-one years old, and don't intend to interfere with it in any way until I think you are capable of taking care of it; and the sooner that time comes the better it will please me." In this declaration there is not lacking a single element necessary for the creation of a valid trust, and to that declaration the nephew assented. The learned judge who wrote the opinion of the general term seems to have taken the view that the trust was executed during the lifetime of defendant's testator by payment to the nephew, but, as it does not appear from the order that the judgment was reversed on the facts, we must assume the facts to be as found by the trial court, and those facts support its judgment.

The order appealed from should be reversed, and the judgment of the special term affirmed, with costs payable out of the estate.

All concur.

Motion for reargument denied June 23, 1891.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frank RUDD, Receiver of the Goodwillie-Wyman Co., Resp.,

v.

(....N. Y....)

1. A director or stockholder is not chargeable as such with actual knowledge of the business transactions of the corporation.
2. Books of account of a corporation are not competent evidence of themselves to establish an account or claim against a trustee or stockholder in an action brought in behalf of the corporation.

(March 30, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, denying his motion for new trial made upon exceptions taken during the trial at the New York Special Term, of an action brought to recover from defendant as a director and stockholder of the Goodwillie-Wyman Company, money and property alleged to have been wrongfully appropriated by him to his own use, which trial resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. S. Jones, with Mr. Thomas Huntington, for appellant:

Books of account are received in evidence, only upon the presumption that no other proof exists. They are justly regarded as the weakest and most suspicious kind of evidence. The admission of them at all is a violation of one of the first principles of the Law of Evidence, which is, that a party shall not himself make evidence in his own favor.

Larue v. Rowland, 7 Barb. 109.

The admission of this class of evidence was a departure from the common-law rule, and the courts are inclined to restrain rather than enlarge the exception itself.

Price v. Torrington, Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. p. 571; Larue v. Rowland, 7 Barb. 107. See Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 573; Merrill v. Ithaca & O. R. Co. 16 Wend. 586; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Weide, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 677, 19 L. ed. 810; Chaffee v. United States, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 516, 21 L. ed. 908.

That corporate books are evidence of corporate acts is not questioned.

Blake v. Griswold, 6 Cent. Rep. 771, 104 N. Y. 618; Abbott, Tr. Ev. p. 46; Haynes v. Brown, 86 N. H. 545.

Before memoranda contained in books of account or elsewhere can be admitted:

NOTE.—Books of account of corporation.

Before the records and books of a corporation can be received in evidence for any purpose, it must be admitted or proved that the entries were made by an authorized agent of the corporation. Glenn v. Orr, 96 N. C. 413.

The records and books of a corporation are, at the least, prima facie evidence of the organization and existence of the corporation. Ibid.; Buncombe Turnp. Co. v. McCarron, 1 Dev. & B. L. 306, citing Highland Turnp. Co. v. McKean, 10 Johns. 154; Grays v. Turnpike Co. of Randolph (Va.) 578; Owings v. Speed, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 420, 5 L. ed. 124; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. §§ 513, 514, 679.

The stock book of a corporation is evidence against a stockholder, in an action to recover the unpaid balance of his subscription, to show that he was a stockholder, and the condition of his stock account; but such evidence may be rebutted. Glenn v. Orr, supra; Turnbull v. Payson, 96 U. S. 418, 24 L. ed. 487.

Books of a business corporation are competent as evidence, so far as related to entries legitimately contained in them, and so far as they are relevant to the issues. Huntington v. Attrill, 118 N. Y. 363, citing Allen v. Coit, 6 Hill, 318; First Nat. Bank of Whitehall v. Tiedale, 84 N. Y. 655; Blake v. Griswold, 5 Cent. Rep. 38, 103 N. Y. 429.

The books of a corporation are admissible in evidence against it, although some of the entries were made by the other party when acting as the secretary of the corporation. Cormac v. Western White Bronze Co. 77 Iowa, 33.

Where the identity of books offered in evidence as the books of an insolvent corporation is testified to by the superintendent and trustee of the corporation, and the handwriting of various officers of the company, by whom the books were written and kept, has been proved, and the books have previously been judicially recognized and accepted as the genuine books of the company, the evidence is certainly sufficient to justify their admission. Vanderwerken v. Glenn, 86 Va. 8.

1. The party making the memorandum or entry must have knowledge himself of the fact entered.

2. The entry must be made with intent to charge the defendant.

Moody v. Roberts, 41 Miss. 74; Cummings v. Nichols, 18 N. H. 420; Van Boery v. Fitzgerald, 21 Neb. 36; Walter v. Bollman, 8 Watts, 544; Peck v. Von Keller, 76 N. Y. 604.

3. The entry must be the original entry and made contemporaneously with the transaction to which it relates.

4. The books of the original entry must be produced and submitted for inspection.

5. Books are incompetent to prove any collateral fact, such as that a person other than the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff.

6. Such entries are not competent to prove on whose account the money was loaned or advanced.

Peck v. Von Keller, supra; Inlee v. Prall, 23 N. J. L. 457, affirmed, 25 N. J. L. 665.

7. Where the person who made the entry is dead the entry cannot be used to prove a claim in favor of his estate.

Mason v. Wedderspoon, 48 Hun, 20.

8. If there is living, attainable evidence then the entries cannot be received.

Price v. Torrington, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 566; Phillips, Ev. (C. H. & E. notes) 4th Am. ed. note 108, p. 870; 1 Greenl. Ev. 115, and note; Brewster v. Doane, 2 Hill, 587; Wood v. Moan, 57 Hun, 536; Ulster County Nat. Bank v. Madden, 114 N. Y. 280.

Tested by these rules the entries in this case are inadmissible.

Messrs. Benjamin F. Blair and Edwin B. Goodell, for respondent:

Corporate books, constituting the accounts of the transactions of a private corporation had through agents and officers, are competent between members and between the corporation and members, on any question which concerns them in their interest as such.

Abbott, Tr. Ev. p. 52; Saunders, Ev. 5th Am. ed. 735, 736; Merchants Bank of Macon v. Rawls, 21 Ga. 239; Greenl. Ev. Redfield's ed. § 493, p. 540; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. § 681; *Lacey v. We have found no case arising in this State in which, in a controversy between a corporation and its members, the question whether its books of account are admissible in its favor has been passed upon.

Cases are not lacking, however, in which, as between members, or as between a member and a stranger, such books have been held admissible per se, upon proper authentication.

Chenango Bridge Co. v. Lewis, 63 Barb. 111; Hubbell v. Meigs, 50 N. Y. 480; First Nat. Bank of Whitehall v. Tisdale, 84 N. Y. 655; Huntington v. Attrill, 118 N. Y. 365; Humphrey v. People, 18 Hun, 893.

The principle upon which corporation books are held admissible in all these cases appears to be analogous to that which underlies the rule admitting partnership books between the partners.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is receiver of the Goodwillie-Wyman Company, an insolvent manufacturing corporation organized under the laws of this State. The action was brought in equity to charge the defendant, as a trustee of the corporation, for the unlawful receipt and appropriation of the money and property of the corporation. An interlocutory judgment was rendered against him, charging him with a large amount of money thus improperly received and appropriated. The liability of the defendant for this money was, in the main, established by the account-books of the corporation, and the principal contention on his behalf upon this appeal is that those books were improperly received as evidence against him. The capital of the corporation is $50,000, of which Robinson, Briggs and Innet, three of the directors, owned $1,000 each, and the balance of the stock was owned by Flisk and Goodwillie, the two other directors. Goodwillie was president, Flisk treasurer, and Briggs vice-president and secretary, of the corporation. There was no proof that the defendant had actual knowledge of the entries contained in the books which were used as evidence against him, or that he authorized such entries or caused them to be made. There was no proof from which the law would raise a legal presumption that he had knowledge of the entries, unless he is chargeable with such knowledge from the mere fact that he was a stockholder and trustee of the corporation. There is no rule of law which charges a director or stockholder of a corporation with actual knowledge of its business transactions merely because he is such director or stockholder. In this case the broad claim is made that, in an action by a corporation against one of its members to enforce a personal liability of the members to the corporation, its books are competent evidence against him to show the condition of the accounts between him and it, and to establish the extent of his liability to it upon their simple production, and proof that they are the books of the corporation, kept as such by its officers and agents. The proposition is thus announced in the points of the learned counsel for the plaintiff: "Between a corporation and its members all its books regularly kept by its officers and agents, for the purpose of recording its transactions and properly conducting its business, are per se evidence." The cases reported in this country and England bearing upon this question are very numerous, and the general expressions of judges contained in their opinions are not entirely harmonious. The conflict, however is mainly in the dicta of judges, and not in decisions actually made. The books of corporations for many purposes are evidence, not only as between the corporation and its members and between members, but also as between the corporation and its members and strangers. They are received in evidence generally to prove corporate acts of a corporation, such as its incorporation, its list of stockholders, its by-laws, the formal proceedings of its board of directors, and its financial condition when its solvency comes in question. But we have not been able, after a careful examination of the authorities cited by the counsel for the plaintiff and many others, to find any case in which it has been decided that the books of account of a corporation are competent evidence, of themselves, to establish an account or claim against a trustee or stockholder in an action brought in behalf of the corporation, and it has been repeatedly said by judges and text-writers that they are not competent for that purpose. In Wharton, Ev. 8d ed. § 682, it is said that, even in suits by a corporation against its members, its books cannot be used as "proving in behalf of the corporation self-serving entries." In Ang. & A. Priv. Corp., 11th ed. § 679, it is said: "Entries in the books of a corporation of private pecuniary transactions with a stockholder are not admissible against him, especially when it does not appear by whom the entries were made." See also 2 Waterman, Corp. 646.

In Hager v. Cleeland, 36 Md. 477, in an action by a creditor of a manufacturing corporation against a stockholder to enforce his individual liability for a debt contracted by the company, it was held that the books of the corporation, relating to its private transactions, were not admissible in evidence.

In Hill v. Manchester & S. Water-Works Co., 5 Barn. & Ad. 866, by a clause in the charter of the defendant, it was enacted that its clerks should, in a book provided by the company, keep an account of all acts, proceedings and transactions of the company, and that every proprietor should have liberty to inspect the same and take copies of the entries; and it was held that entries of the proceedings in the books thus kept by the clerk were not admissible in evidence on behalf of the company against one of their own members suing them. Denman, Ch. J., writing the opinion, and speaking of certain facts to be proved, said: "These points of fact, however, could only be established by the books kept by the clerk of the company; and the question now to be decided is whether they are evidence against the plaintiff. It is argued that they were, because he was a proprietor, and the books of a partnership are evidence against any one of the partners; and more particularly as the act requires such books of the proceedings to be kept, and that all the proprietors shall have free access to them at all reasonable times. We are, however, of opinion the principle on which partnership books are evidence against the partners is that they are the acts and declarations of such partners, being kept by themselves or by their authority, by their servants, and under their direction and superintendence. But the clerk of the company, once appointed, is subject to the control of no individual member, and the free access provided for is only for the purpose of inspection. A proprietor entering into a contract with the company must be deemed a stranger, and can be affected by no entry made under orders from the entire body."

In Haynes v. Brown, 36 N. H. 545, the action was by a creditor of a corporation to recover against a stockholder; and it was held that the books of the corporation were not admissible against a member of the company, as evidence of his private transactions or dealings with the company, and that in respect to them he was to be regarded as a stranger. That case has been frequently cited by text-writers and judges, and its authority for the rule thus announced has never been questioned, so far as we can discover.

In Chenango Bridge Co. v. Lewis, 68 Barb. 111, it was held that the books of a bridge company, proved by its treasurer to have been received by him as the company books upon his accession to the office, containing an account of the tolls received for the bridge for several years previous to that time, were not admissible as against the defendant, a stockholder of the company, to prove the amount of the tolls received during that period, without the necessary and preliminary proof as to such tolls; but that such books proved by its treasurer to have been kept by him and to contain correct entries of tolls, as given to him by the toll-gatherer, coupled with the proof by the toll-gatherer that he had made correct returns of the tolls received by him, were admissible, because proved by the treasurer who kept them. See also Olney v. Chadsey, 7 R. I. 224; Wheeler v. Walker, 45 N. H. 855.

In Pearsall v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 124 N. Y. 250, decided in the second division of this court on the 22d day of last January, the plaintiff was a stockholder of the defendant, and brought the action to recover damages against the defendant for not properly transmitting a message; and it was offered to be proved in defense of the action that the board of directors had adopted a resolution that it would not be liable for mistakes or delays in the transmission or delivery of unrepeat messages, and would not be liable for damages arising from delays in the transmission or delivery of a repeated message beyond an amount specified; and it was insisted that a shareholder was chargeable with notice of this resolution. The resolution was excluded, and the defendant excepted, and it was held that in this there was no error; that a shareholder in a corporation is not chargeable with constructive notice of resolutions adopted by the board of directors, or by provisions in the by-laws regulating the mode in which its business shall be transacted with its customers, and that the plaintiff's rights arising out of defendant's contract to transmit the message were in no wise limited by its regulations or by-laws not brought to his knowledge. That case is ample authority to show that the defendant in this case was not chargeable with knowledge of the entries made in the books of this company, and that such books were not competent evidence against him of such entries. The principle at the foundation of that decision is that the business transactions of a corporation with its members are on the same footing as its transactions with strangers, and that the business entries in the books of a corporation are no more evidence against the members than they are against strangers.

After a careful consideration of all the cases which have come to our attention, we can perceive no principle upon which the account-books of a corporation can be evidence against a member of the corporation of the accounts and entries therein made in a suit brought by the corporation or its representatives against him to enforce his liability upon such account. The officers and book-keepers of a corporation are in no sense his agents. Individually he has no control over their acts, and has no responsibility therefor; and in making the entries they do not, in any legal sense, represent or bind him. As to the competency of such books, directors and stockholders of a corporation stand upon the same footing. It is quite true that a director stands in a more favorable position to know what is going on within the corporation, and to be more familiar with its books in some cases, than a stockholder. He has the right to inspect the books of the corporation, and so has a stockholder. A stockholder having the ability is just as able to become familiar with the contents of the books of a corporation to which he belongs as a director, and there is no principle of law by which a director can be charged with knowledge of the entries in the books of a corporation which is not equally applicable to its stockholders. It is frequently easier to charge a director with knowledge of the books than it is to charge a stockholder, because he usually has an active part in the management of the corporation; but, as a general rule, many directors in corporations are just as ignorant, and necessarily so, of the particular accounts contained in its books as the stockholders are. It would be quite a dangerous, and we think startling, proposition to hold that a clerk or other officer in a business corporation could enter charges in its books of account against a director or stockholder which could be proved in favor of the corporation by the mere production of the books, thus throwing upon him, or his personal representatives after his death, the burden of explaining the entries or showing them to be untrue, and we believe the doctrine has no support in principle or authority. A corporation seeking to enforce a claim against one of its directors or stockholders must establish it by the application of the same rules of evidence which are applied in an action brought by an individual to enforce a claim against any defendant. It was admitted on the argument of this case that the evidence furnished by the account-books was vital to the plaintiff's case, and we therefore do not deem it important to examine the other points zealously and ably argued before us.

For the error pointed out, the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

CONSOLIDATED TANK LINE CO.,

Appt.,
v.

HUNT.

(....Iowa....)

The words "teamster or other laborer" who "habitually earns his living" with a horse or team as used in the Code which makes such horse or team exempt, include one whose business is to sell oil which he delivers for the most part by a tank wagon usually driven by his boy, although a few sales are made and the oil delivered at a room where it is stored.

Statement by Granger, J.:

Appellant brought an action to recover for oils sold to the defendant, and obtained an attachment, which was levied on a team, harness and oil-wagon. The defendant moved the court to discharge the attached property, and assigned as reasons therefor the following: "The said team and harness and oil-wagon is the only one owned by the defendant; that defendant is a married man, and the head of a family, and resides in Clarinda, Page County, Iowa; that said team, harness and wagon is the only one owned by defendant, and the only one by which defendant habitually earns a living for his family. It is therefore exempt under the law, as is more fully shown by affidavits hereto attached, marked 'A' and 'B,' and made a part hereof." Affidavits were filed in support of and against the motion, upon a consideration of which the court below sustained the motion, from which order the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. W. W. Morgan for appellant.

Messrs. Clark & Hill and J. R. Good for appellee.

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testimony gives support to the following facts: That the defendant is a resident of Page County, Iowa, a married man, and the head of a family; that prior to March, 1889, he was engaged in selling oils and gasoline at Clarinda, Iowa; that after that he was engaged in a retail trade in those articles, having a place of business known as "head-quarters," in the back room of a building on the north side of the square in Clarinda. From these head-quarters for a time he delivered his sales in an ordinary wagon, and afterwards from the wagon in suit, known as a "tank-wagon." The wholesale trade was discontinued June 27, 1889, for which trade his oils had been stored near the depot. After the discontinuance of the wholesale trade his oils for the retail trade were stored at and delivered from the head-quarters. A few sales were made, including the delivery at the head-quarters, but the general business was carried on by orders being left at head-quarters to be filled about the city from the tank-wagon, and in some cases cans would be "set out" by the customers, and these were also filled from the wagon. At times the oils would be paid for at head-quarters, but generally at the place of delivery. The team for the purpose of delivering the oils was sometimes driven by the defendant in person, and sometimes by his minor son, sixteen years of age. At times both were with the team. The evidence favors the view that most of the time the son was with the team and delivered the oils, but for his father. The oils were received at head-quarters in quantities of from three to five barrels at a time. The team, harness and wagon were used by the defendant in this business, and the business is defendant's means of earning a living. Appellant insists that the facts do not sustain the action of the court. Counsel for appellant states his view of the law in these words: "In my judgment, the right has been clearly defined by statute, and under the statute, in order to maintain the exemption, the debtor must show that he is a teamster or other laborer, who by his personal use of the property habitually earns his living." The Statute to be construed is as follows: "If the debtor is a resident of this State, and is the head of a family, he may hold exempt from execution the following property: . . . The horse or team . . . and the wagon or other vehicle, with a proper harness or tackle, by the use of which the debtor, if a physician, public officer, farmer, teamster or other laborer, habitually earns his living." It is conceded on authority that the Statute is to receive a liberal construction. It would be a grave disregard of the concession were we to hold to the view claimed by appellant, that because the team was driven by the son, though for the father, the debtor is not within the provisions of the law as to exemptions. Let us suppose one who is a laborer or teamster, and earns his living by the personal use of his team, is disabled, we will say, totally, and a minor son, by the use of the team, supports the family; will it be said that the owner if a debtor loses his right of exemption? Confining ourselves to the literal definition of the word "laborer" or "teamster" as quoted in argument, such a result might follow. But looking to the law and the purposes of its enactment there is no difficulty in saying that such a case is clearly within its purview, and that the debtor would come within the statutory meaning of the word "teamster" or "laborer." If a widow, who is the head of a family and a debtor, owns a team by the use of which her living is supplied, may she be deprived of this means of earning a living merely because she does not in person perform the labor of driving the team? These plain propositions pave the way to clearly observe the legislative purpose. It is strenuously urged that the defendant is not a teamster or laborer, but a merchant, and as such is not entitled to the exemption. It is true that the defendant is engaged in a small way in the sale of merchandise. He has a back room of a building, used more for storage than for any other purpose, which is a base of supplies for his delivery system or business; and the business is carried on mainly by the use of the team; and it is manifest that without the use of the team he has no business to supply a living, for he says that the profits of computed sales at the head-quarters would not pay his rent. Any person thus engaged in receiving and distributing oils must be said to be a laborer. He "is one who labors in a toilsome occupation." The use of the team is necessary to carry on the occupation, and hence, if the occupation supplies his living, he earns his living by the use of his team. That the living is not wholly so earned is not material. The same exemption, upon the same conditions, is made to the physician, public officer and farmer, in which cases it will be readily understood that the use of the team would be but an aid to the profession or calling. If a physician may have the exemption as an aid to the business of his profession by which he obtains a living, why may not the laborer—one who chops the wood in the forest, or quarries the rock from the hillside, to be put by the use of a team on the market to supply his living—have the same protection. The fact that the laborer utilizes his efforts in the way of an independent, rather than a dependent, business, should not operate to his disadvantage. This is the situation of the defendant. If he employed another to do the work of receiving the oils, replenishing the tank and delivering about the city, the employé would without question be a laborer. The defendant is not less so merely because he directs and owns the business, besides performing the labor. The district court, from the evidence, must have found that the defendant was, within the statutory meaning, a teamster or laborer, and that finding is conclusive upon us unless the record affirmatively shows the court in error, and we do not think it does. The case of Root v. Gay, 64 Iowa, 399, supports our conclusion.

NOTE.—For decisions as to execution exemptions, see notes to Robinson v. Hughes (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 383; Watson v. Lederer (Colo.) 1 L. R. A. 354; 12 L. R. A.

Affirmed.

CASS COUNTY BANK

v.

George WEBER et al., Appts.

(....Iowa....)

1. The homestead exemption extends to the entire building used both for a family

NOTE—Homestead; doctrine as to exemption of portion of building.

With the exception of the Iowa courts, courts do not seem inclined to divide a building in favor of the creditors of a homestead claimant so as to per-residence and a hotel where no rooms used exclusively for hotel purposes could be used without passing through rooms occupied by the family, and the rooms used for the office and bar-room, sitting and dining rooms were also in common use by the family.

2. A separate building used for business purposes, and a stable used for hotel purposes, on the same lot with a hotel which is exempt as a family homestead, are not part of the homestead.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County disallowing their claim to homestead exemption in certain property, and making it subject to plaintiff's judgment. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Granger, J.:

The defendants, George and L. A. Weber, are husband and wife. George Weber is a judgment debtor to the plaintiff bank. In 1885 George Weber conveyed to his wife eighty acres of land and four lots in the City of Atlantic, and this action is to set aside the conveyance as in fraud of the plaintiff's rights as a judgment creditor. The issues involve the bona fides of the transfer, and also the homestead character of the lots in the City of Atlantic. The district court made the following finding of fact and judgment entry: "(1) That on the 20th day of November, 1886, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against one Wm. Kreamer and the defendant George Weber for the sum of $619.72, and ten per cent interest from the date thereof, and the further sum of $49.09 costs, with six per cent interest from the date thereof. (3) That said judgment is the property of the plaintiff, and wholly unsatisfied and unpaid, and that W. H. Kreamer is wholly insolvent, and has no property from which said judgment can be made. (8) That defendant George Weber has no property in his own name from which said judgment can be realized. (4) That on April 15, 1885, the defendant Geo. Weber made and delivered to the defendant L. A. Weber, his wife, a deed of conveyance for the following described real estate, to wit: Lots 9, 10, 11 and 12, in block 14, in the City of Atlantic, Cass County, Iowa; and the north half of the northeast quarter of section 12, township 75 north, of range 85 west, 5th P. M., Cass County, Iowa, being the property then owned by the defendant Geo. Weber. (5) That said deed was made without consideration, and for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the creditors of defendant Geo. Weber. (6) That part of the building on lot 12, block 14, Atlantic, Iowa, is occupied by the defendant L. A. Weber as a homestead for herself and family, and was so occupied prior to the contracting of the debt herein. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the deed of conveyance from the defendant Geo. Weber to the defendant L. A. Weber, his wife, conveying the above-described real estate, and recorded in book 79, on page 426, of the Records of Cass County, Iowa, be held for naught, as concerns this plaintiff, and that the lien of this plaintiff's judgment is declared prior and paramount to any lien or interest the defendants George or L. A. Weber may have in the premises, except their right of homestead in and to parts of the building situated on lots 11 and 12, block 14, Atlantic, Iowa; mit them to levy on a portion of it. They appear to prefer, if possible, to hold the property either exempt or not exempt as a whole according to the use to which it is put. The homestead which the debtor owns and occupies is exempt with a specified quantity of land appurtenant thereto, without regard to the uses to which he puts the land or the business he pursues upon it. Binsel v. Grogan, 67 Wls. 152.

The Homestead Laws are not intended to save a mere shelter for the debtor and his family, but to give him the full enjoyment of the whole lot of ground exempted to be used in whatever way he may think best for the occupancy and support of his family, whether in the way of cultivating it or by the erection and use of buildings upon it either for the carrying on of his own business, or for deriving income in the way of rent. Hubbell v. Canady, 58 Ill. 427.

Use of portion of building by owner for business purposes.

Under a statute providing that a homestead to the extent of one acre, occupied as a residence by the family of the owner, together with all the improvements on the same, shall be exempt, the whole house occupied as a home by the debtor is exempt although a portion of the same is used and was constructed with a view to be used as a brewery; the building cannot be divided into two portions, one of which is exempt and the other not. Re Tertelling, 2 Dill, 389.

Where a building whose size and number of rooms are not shown is occupied as a residence by the family of the owner, its homestead character is not destroyed by proof that a single room or two is used by the owner for business purposes. Hogan v. Manners, 23 Kan. 559.

Where the upper story of the building was occupied as a dwelling, the fact that the lower floor was used by the husband for business purposes was of no consequence, the court remarking that "no one would imagine that a person would lose his homestead privilege if he should happen to use some room in his dwelling for his law office or his wife should in her own right carry on dress-making in one of the apartments. Orr v. Shraft, 22 Mich. 264. The fact that the homesteader's wife carries on a retail grocery and provision business in the first story of the main building situated on a homestead claim, and also uses the cellar in connection with her business, will not deprive it of its homestead character or permit a sale of any portion of it on execution. Rush v. Gordon, 38 Kan. 536.

The right of homestead may exist in the whole of a country hotel. Lasell v. Lasell, 90 Mass. 875.

So where a building designed for a dwelling-house and occupied by the owner and his family was subsequently devoted by him to hotel purposes, the building did not lose its homestead character, at least if the extent of the hotel business did not interfere with the general character of the building as a dwelling-house. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 18 Cal. 183.

But property used primarily and principally for hotel purposes cannot be made subject to a homestead exemption. Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 116.

Effect of renting a portion of the building for business purposes.

Under a statute providing that a homestead consisting of one fourth of an acre of land and the that plaintiff's judgment is hereby declared and established as a lien from the date thereof, November 20, 1886, upon the following described real estate, as paid in plaintiff's petition, to wit: The north half of the northeast quarter of section 12, in township 75 north, of range 35 west, 5th P. M., Cass County, Iowa; and upon the upper story and the front room down-stairs, and the cellar thereunder, of the brick building situated on lot 12 in block 14, in Atlantic, Iowa; and also the upper story and the east room on the ground floor of the frame building joining the brick on the west, situated on the same lot and block; and also all the ground covered by the frame business-house and stables, being the west end of lots 10, 11 and 12, and all of lot 9, all in block 14, Atlantic, Iowa." The defendants appeal.

Messrs. L. L. DeLano and Willard & Willard, for appellants:

If the principal use of the building is that of a residence and a home for the family it would not be liable to execution because rooms in it are rented to others.

The house could not be divided as suggested by the court below.

Bebb v. Crowe, 39 Kan. 342; Rush v. Gordon, 38 Kan. 585; Hogan v. Mannors, 28 Kan. 551; Wright v. Dittler, 54 Iowa, 620.

If the stable was erected for domestic purposes in connection with the use of the homestead it is not liable to execution; and if it can be considered the shop or other building "really used and occupied by the owner in the prosecution of his own ordinary business," it has not been shown to be worth more than $800, and therefore it cannot be subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment.

Smith v. Quiggans, 85 Iowa, 637.

The conveyance of the homestead by the husband to the wife, or vice versa, has no effect whatever upon the homestead rights, and whether the conveyance be fraudulent and without consideration, or in good faith and for a valuable consideration, it cannot affect the homestead rights of the parties, nor can it subject their homestead to a sale under execution against either of them.

Green v. Farrar, 53 Iowa, 426; Spoon v. Van Fossen, 58 Iowa, 494; Lowell v. Shannon, 60 Iowa, 713; Griffin v. Sholey, 55 Iowa, 513.

Messrs. C. F. Loofbourow and Phelps & Temple, for appellee:

To be a homestead the place must be used, and used for the purposes designated by the law, to wit, as a home, a place to abide in, a place for the family.

Charles v. Lamberson, 1 Iowa, 485.

When the exemption claimants voluntarily devote part of the land, which would otherwise be exempt, to the uses of an outside business, and the value of the property thus used exceeds $300 in value, they cannot claim an exemption in this property.

Rhodes v. McCormick, 4 Iowa, 368; Mayfield v. Maaden, 59 Iowa, 517; Johnson v. Moser, 66 Iowa, 586.

dwelling-house thereon and its appurtenances, owned and occupied by any resident of the State, shall not be subject to execution, a building consisting of three stories and a basement, the basement and first story of which are rented for business purposes and the upper stories occupied by the owner and his family as a residence, is all exempt. Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 80.

Under a statute exempting a homestead not exceeding in amount one lot, the uses to which the lot is put are immaterial and no portion of the building thereon is subject to execution, although the lower part is built, rented and used for a store, the cellar also being rented, and a portion of the upper floors being used for offices, while the owner's family occupied the back part of the building as a residence. Kelly v. Baker, 10 Minn. 164.

The fact that part of a building is leased to a third person, who carries on a mercantile business in it, does not destroy its homestead character when the owner reserves the right of using it for reaching the part used as his home, the court suggesting a doubt as to whether or not a portion of the building only could be sold on execution. Bebb v. Crowe, 39 Kan. 342.

A three-story brick building, the second story of which is occupied as a residence by the owner and his family, and the first story is occupied by a tenant at will, and the third by a tenant under a written lease for five years, is exempt as an entirety, and a receiver cannot be appointed to receive the rents and income due on the lease and apply them on a judgment. Winland v. Holcomb, 26 Minn. 296.

The head of a family, who occupies one room of his building as a residence, does not lose his homestead right by renting out the balance of the building for use as a hotel. Gainus v. Cannon, 42 Ark. 514.

Effect of renting rooms.

If property has been dedicated as a homestead, and is actually occupied by the owner for that purpose, the fact that the larger portion of the rooms was let to lodgers will not destroy the homestead right in the whole building. Goldman v. Clark, 1 Nev. 608.

The fact that certain rooms in a single building adapted to one family are rented for an annual rent paid to the owner will not exclude that part from being a portion of the homestead; the homestead right is not necessarily limited to that portion of the dwelling which is occupied by the family of the owner. Mercier v. Chace, 98 Mass. 194.

Rule in case of double houses.

Under provisions exempting premises "owned and occupied" by a citizen of the State, a double house erected, one half for the use of the owner and the other half to rent, and actually put to such use, will not be exempt as to the rented part. Dyson v. Sholey, 11 Mich. 528.

Where the homestead is defined as the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides and the land on which the same is situated, a landowner who erects thereon a double house with distinct entrances and no connection between them on the inside, intending one for his residence and the other for tenants, and devoting them to that purpose, cannot claim the rented part as exempt. Tiernan v. His Creditors, 62 Cal. 228.

The Iowa decisions.

Under the Iowa Statute providing substantially that the homestead must embrace the house used as a home by the owner thereof and not more than one dwelling-house nor any other buildings except such as are properly appurtenant to the homestead

Granger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. This case, as to its facts in detail, is like many another, where a wife has money in her own right which she gives to her husband for general use, without any agreement or expectation that it is a loan, or creates any obligation for payment, until in later years, when, through the vicissitudes of fortune, the transaction is made a means of protecting her husband's property against his creditors. From the evidence, though quite conflicting in many respects, the district court found that the conveyance was without consideration, and for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the creditors of George Weber; and, after considering the evidence, we concur in its conclusion.

2. The more difficult question in the case is that of homestead exemption. The property claimed as a homestead is that in the City of Atlantic, lots 9, 10, 11 and 12. These lots have each a frontage of 25 feet and a depth of 140 feet. On lot 12 there was originally built a brick building, with the first floor designed for a business room and living rooms above. The property was afterwards sold to Dierksen & Hansen, who converted it into a hotel known as the "Farmers' Home." The first story was made into two rooms, the first being used as an office and bar-room, and the other as a dining-room. This building is fifty feet in length by 32 feet in width. The second story is reached by a stairway from the front room or office. Underneath is a cellar, access to which is by a stairway from the dining-room. North, and, as we understand, on the side, of this brick building, was built a frame addition, with kitchen and bedroom. Additions were also made to the brick of frame structures, in which were a sitting-room and bedroom of the ground floor, and bedrooms above. Between the sitting-room and the dining-room, was a wash-room, through which access was had from the brick part to the bedroom, and through the wash-room and bedroom to the sitting-room, the sleeping-rooms in this part being over the sitting-room. It thus appears that the district court found that the parts of the building not occupied as a homestead are, of the brick part, the upper rooms, and the front room below, used as the office, and the cellar beneath; also the bedroom east of and between the sitting-room and wash-room in the frame part, as by its decree the plaintiff's judgment is made a lien thereon. We regret that the condition of the record leaves some uncertainty as to these particular facts. We have endeavored, however, to be precise in our findings. On the rear end of lots 10, 11 and 12, and on lot 9, there were erected some stables for the use of the hotel, and after Weber purchased the premises he built on the lots at the rear end a frame business-house. The stabling was used by the defendants for the purpose of carrying on their business of hotel keeping, and neither that nor the frame business-house was used as a part of the homestead, and the district court thus found.

Our findings of fact as to the homestead occupation do not exactly accord with those of the district court. That the defendants had a homestead in the premises is not questioned. Hence we are not to inquire whether or not there is a homestead, but, conceding one, we inquire after its intent. In Rhodes v. McCormick, 4 Iowa, 368, it is said: "When an execution defendant shall use a particular building as a home, the whole of such building, in as such, it was not the intention to exempt from execution an entire building for whatever purpose used. One portion or floor may be exempt while others are not. So where a building was three stories high with a cellar, the upper ones being used as a dwelling and the first story and cellar being designed and rented for business purposes, and not being used by the owner as a home nor in the prosecution of his ordinary business, the first story and cellar were liable to execution while the others were not. Rhodes v. McCormick, 4 Iowa, 372.

But where the building was two stories high with cellar, no part of which was originally intended for business purposes, and the owner occupied the whole building himself, the upper story as a residence and the lower one for business purposes, the cellar being used in connection with the store and for family purposes, and the only convenient access to it as well as to the living rooms being through the store, the whole building was exempt. Wright v. Ditzler, 54 Iowa, 626.

In Mayfield v. Maasden, 59 Iowa, 517, the court states that some doubt may exist as to the correctness of Rhodes v. McCormick, supra, but that they would not be justified in overruling it, and decide that a brick house consisting of two stories and basement, of which the second story was occupied as a dwelling and was reached by stairs leading from the street and partitioned off from the room in the first story, and the first story was used as a grocery store, saloon and restaurant (by whom did not appear), except a small portion partitioned off by temporary partitions and used as a store-room, in part by the owner, and the front part of the basement had been used as a barber shop but not since the rendition of the judgment.—was exempt 12 L. R. A.

as to the second story, the stairway and the basement, but not as to the first story.

Smith v. Quiggans, 65 Iowa, 637, was a case quite similar to the preceding, with the exception that the store in the first story was occupied by the owner himself in carrying on his business, and was shown to be within the limit of value fixed by the statute, and the whole building was held to be exempt.

When the building was of brick four stories high, with cellar, the second and third of which were occupied by the owner as a residence, the first as a storeroom and place of business, and the fourth, which was unfinished, as a place for drying clothes, the greater part of the cellar being used in connection with the business, and the remainder by the family, and access could be gained to the second story by outside stairways, and a sort of elevator ran from the cellar to the fourth floor, and the only stairway leading to the cellar was from the store, the value of the business portion of the building being greater than the statutory limit, the first and fourth stories and so much of the cellar as was used for business purposes were not exempt, though the remainder of the building was; and the sale of those portions would carry the right to use the hatchways in the second and third floors and the elevator apparatus to reach the fourth floor, and would be subject to the homesteader's right to use the stairway from the store to the cellar for family purposes. Johnson v. Moser, 66 Iowa, 540.

So where the first floor was used by the owner as a saloon it was liable to execution under Code, § 1558, for damages accruing by reason of the unlawful sale of liquors by him therein. Arnold v. Gotshall, 71 Iowa, 572.

cases of controversy and disagreement will be presumed to constitute and be a part of the homestead until it is shown, by the party adversely interested, that some specific portion is not of the homestead character, and therefore not exempt." As to the office room, the bedroom and the cellar, we have no difficulty in reaching a conclusion that they are not brought within the rule. The most that can be said is that there is shown to be, to some extent, a joint occupancy of them for homestead and hotel purposes. Of the bedroom it is true that it was used as a sleeping-room for guests of the hotel, but at the same time it was used by the family as a passageway from the dining-room to the sitting-room, both of which were found to be parts of the homestead. Now let us suppose the bedroom had not been used for a sleeping-room by any person, but merely a room through which the family passed to the sitting-room from other parts of the house. We do not think that state of facts would justify a finding that it was not used as a part of the homestead, nor do we think the mere fact of its use by the guests of the hotel, while at the same time used for the other purpose, would deplete it of its character as a part of the homestead. Now the front or office room was used as an office and bar-room, but it was at the same time used by the family. It was a means of ingress and egress from the street. It was a front room, back of which was the dining-room, and still back the washroom, bedroom and sitting-room. These rooms were all devoted to the same purpose. At least it does not appear that they were not, and we assume facts not otherwise established in harmony with the homestead right. It is not as if it was shown that one story of the building was used as a store or shop, or leased and occupied by a stranger, which use would indicate of itself a disuse by the family. The entertainment of hotel guests and of boarders is often in a manner to be consistent with an occupation at the same time, by the family, of the apartments as a part of the home. Such entertainment would, it is true, often, if not generally, be a limitation upon the use by the family of certain apartments, but not to the extent of exclusion. If the office room had not been thus used, but had been a room into which the family occasionally went, and through which it passed from the other apartments to and from the street, we do not understand that it would, from such a state of facts, be so devalued of a homestead character as to be liable to execution. Neither will the fact that it is so used in connection with another use have such an effect. The same is true of the cellar. It was used for hotel purposes, but also for the family. The business of the hotel and the support of the family, as to work and supplies, as well as occupation, were so mingled naturally that it is a task of much difficulty to show separate occupations or use, and the burden of doing so is with the plaintiff. The upper story of the brick building is divided into five sleeping-rooms, and these the record shows were used exclusively for the guests of the hotel, and not by the family for homestead purposes; that is, they are a part of the homestead building, but not particularly occupied by the family. The legal problem in this respect, in the light of authority, is somewhat difficult. Following the rule of Rhodes v. McCormick, supra; Mayfield v. Maasden, 59 Iowa, 517, and Johnson v. Moser, 66 Iowa, 586, that apartments of the homestead building not occupied as such are liable to execution, and we should find for the plaintiff; and under these authorities our duty would be clear but for the fact that in this case the only means of access to these rooms is through the office room, which we hold to be a part of the homestead, and we possess no authority to invade the homestead right by continuing the present means of access unless we extend what is now by many regarded as a rule of doubtful merit,—that of partitioning a homestead building between a debtor and his creditors, which we are not inclined to do. It would of course be idle to hold that a room or rooms in a building not used by the family were liable to execution when the purchaser would have but a barren right,—the title without a right of occupancy or use,—and that, so far as disclosed by the record, would be the situation in this case. In Johnson v. Moser, supra, the homestead was limited to the two middle stories of a four-story building, and a right of access was given to the fourth story by hatchways through the floors of the homestead part, and a hoisting apparatus connected with the fourth story. This means of access, it seems, was a part of the plan of constructing the building, and could be continued without any interference with the occupation of the homestead part of the building. It was in effect an independent means of access, and the hatchway could never have been regarded as a part of the homestead. It was therefore no invasion of the homestead right. The difference between that case and a right of access to these rooms, through the front room below, is too obvious to deserve notice. Such a right would be a serious impairment of the homestead privilege. For reasons certainly not stronger, in Wright v. Ditzler, 54 Iowa, 620, a room used as a store-room for the sale of merchandise was distinguished and held exempt from execution. Its sale would have interfered with the use and occupation of the living rooms above and cellar below. A similar thought is made use of in Johnson v. Moser, supra, in holding that parts of the building might be sold. It is said: "Their sale will not unreasonably interfere with the use of the defendant of those portions of the building which he occupies as a place of residence." The same cannot be said of this case, with a right of access as it now is. These considerations lead us to the conclusion that the entire building should be treated as exempt from execution under the Homestead Law, and that the decree of the district court should be thus modified.

8. A point is made in the argument that defendant George Weber was only surety for one W. H. Kreamer, on the note on which the plaintiff's judgment was obtained, and that plaintiff has alleged, but has not proven, the insolvency of Kreamer. Without an intimation as to the law applicable, we think the fact is otherwise. With an additional abstract, we think the insolvency appears. The decree of the district court is approved, except as to the modification suggested.

The narrowness of a bridge and the insufficiency of its railings are not the proximate cause of an injury to an occupant of a cutter dragged off the bridge by a horse which fell and broke the railing in consequence of disease or choking by the harness.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Decatur County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. W. Curry and S. A. Gates for appellant.

Mr. S. H. Amos, with Messrs. Parrish & Hoffman, for appellee:

Neither of the two defects claimed by the plaintiff—and the only two defects, viz., insufficient railing and width of bridge—had anything to do with the fall in the first instance. Whatever it was it was in the horse and not in the bridge, and consequently no recovery can be had against the town.

DeCamp v. Sioux City, 74 Iowa, 892; West v. Ward, 77 Iowa, 824; Spaulding v. Sherman, 76 Wis. 77.

If Miller, in whose sleigh plaintiff was riding, and who was driving, was guilty of contributory negligence, then his negligence was imputed to her, even if it is held that she was innocent of actual contributory negligence.

There was another available crossing and Miller certainly incurred danger which there was no necessity for incurring.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1888, defendant controlled and was responsible for the condition of a certain bridge over a railway within its territorial limits. The bridge was twelve feet wide, provided with side railings, and reached by means of steep approaches. In the month named, one Ira Miller invited plaintiff and another lady to take a sleigh-ride for pleasure. The invitation was accepted, and the party started in a cutter drawn by one horse. In the course of the ride they attempted to cross the bridge described. The horse drew the cutter with its load up the steep approach, and onto the bridge. When a part of the way over, the horse suddenly fell against the railing on one side of the bridge, broke it down, and dropped off, drawing with him the cutter and its lady occupants. Plaintiff fell to the ground below and received the injuries for which she seeks to recover in this action. She claims that the defendant was negligent in maintaining a bridge of insufficient width, in not providing it with sufficient railings and in permitting it to be used without sufficient railings. Defendant avers that the accident occurred without fault on its part, in consequence of the carelessness of plaintiff and the negligence of Miller, and insists that the alleged defects in the bridge were not the proximate cause of the injuries received by plaintiff. After the evidence had been submitted on the part of both parties the court sustained a motion of defendant to direct the jury to return a verdict in its favor. A verdict was returned in favor of defendant by direction of the court, and judgment was rendered thereon. The first ground alleged in the motion for a verdict was that the evidence showed that the defects alleged in the bridge were not the proximate cause of the injury. It appears without contradiction that there was snow about half way up the approach to the bridge, and none on the bridge. The horse pulled steadily and without apparent difficulty in going onto the bridge, fell without warning of any kind, and appears to have been dead when he fell. Miller, who owned the horse, is of the opinion that its death was caused by heart disease, although it may have been choked by the breast harness in which it was pulling at the time. To entitle plaintiff to recover it must be shown that the injuries of which she complains were the natural and proximate result of the alleged defects in the bridge. West v. Ward, 77 Iowa, 825, and cases therein cited.

Under the evidence submitted we do not think that is a matter about which there can be any controversy. The horse which Miller was driving fell because it was diseased, or not properly harnessed and driven. The width of the bridge and the condition of the railing had nothing to do with its fall and death. Had it not fallen, the accident would not have occurred. The railing of the bridge was about two and a half feet high, and it may be true that, had it been of sufficient height and strength to bear the weight of the horse, the accident would have been avoided. But defendant was not an insurer against accidents. 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 789; Raymond v. Lowell, 6 Cush. 524. It was its duty to provide for the use of the bridge in the usual manner, and to guard against ordinary contingencies, or those which might be reasonably apprehended. It was its duty to provide railings of sufficient height and strength to prevent horses and other animals from walking off at the side, and to resist any weight and pressure which would be applied under ordinary circumstances; but it was not its duty to provide a railing which would successfully resist the weight of a horse of ordinary size precipitated suddenly against it. It is said that if the bridge had been wider the horse might have been turned when it was discovered that there was no snow on the bridge, but there is no evidence to justify the claim that the horse would have been turned under any circumstances. On the contrary, it is shown that Miller knew the bridge was bare before he drove onto it. We conclude that the condition of the railing and the narrowness of the bridge were not the proximate cause of the injuries sustained by plaintiff. See De Camp v. Sioux City, 74 Iowa, 892; Handelin v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 710; Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 98.

The case of Houff v. Fulton, 29 Wis. 297, is relied upon as sustaining the claim of appellant. The facts involved in that case were somewhat similar to those under consideration, but it appears that the bridge was without a railing, and that the injury might not have occurred had there been a suitable one. The essentials of such a railing were not considered, and much of what was said in that case is in harmony with conclusions we have announced. We find it unnecessary to determine some of the questions discussed by counsel for appellant, since the one determined is controlling. In our opinion, the evidence shows without conflict that defendant is not liable for the injuries sustained by plaintiff, and the case was properly taken from the jury.

A note payable to a certain person "et al., or order," is not negotiable because of uncertainty as to the unnamed payee. This rule is not changed by Code, § 2035, making an instrument promising to pay money or property to another negotiable if such is the manifest intent of the maker.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Lee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount due on an alleged promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Given, J.:

Plaintiff, as assignee for value and before maturity of two promissory notes executed by defendants, payable "to Charles R. Whitesell et al. or order," asks judgment thereon, and foreclosure of a mortgage given by defendants to secure the same. Defendants answered that the notes and mortgage were executed for part of the purchase price of certain real estate sold to them by Charles R., Emily, J. L. and Phebe J. Whitesell, and for which Charles R., J. L. and Phebe J. executed to defendants a warranty deed warranting the title to said property. The answer alleges breach of the covenants of warranty, and damage in the sum of $500, which defendants ask as offset against the notes. Plaintiff demurred to the answer on the ground that the damages set up were claims against the payee of the notes, and no defense against the notes, in his hands, he being a purchaser before maturity, and without notice; and that the answer sets up no defense to said notes, as against the plaintiff, he being an innocent holder for value before maturity. The demurrer was sustained, and defendants elected to stand upon their answer, and refused to plead over, and decree was entered for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal.

Messrs. H. Scott Howell & Son, for appellants:

Certainty is the primary law of negotiability. A promissory note in order to be negotiable must be certain as to the amount, the maker and the payee.

Smith v. Marland, 59 Iowa, 645; Story, Prom. Notes, 6th ed. § 85; Parsons, Bills and Notes, p. 81; 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 150, 155; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 2d ed. § 99; 1 Edw. Bills and Notes, 3d ed. § 140. See also Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 848.

A transfer of the note can only be by a joint indorsement of all the payees.

Ryhnier v. Feickert, 92 Ill. 805.

Messrs. Craig, McCrary & Craig, for appellees:

A negotiable instrument is one which may be transferred by indorsement or delivery, so as to give a right of action to the person to whom it is so indorsed or delivered in his own name on the instrument so transferred.

1 Wait, Act. and Def. p. 585, and authorities cited.

The additional words or abbreviation "et al." are of no importance and give to the notes no additional payee. If any words are used which indicate that the maker or any other party to the instrument intended that it should be negotiable, the law will give effect to that intention, as against said party.

United States v. White, 2 Hill, 59; Willeys v. Phania Bank, 2 Duer, 121; Chitty, Bills, Am. ed. 1859, 218; Code, § 2035.

A note payable to the steamboat Juda, and its owners, or order, is negotiable.

Moore v. Anderson, 8 Ind. 18.

Given, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The discussion is addressed entirely to the question whether the promissory notes sued upon are negotiable. It will be observed that they are promises to pay to "Charles R. Whitesell et al. or order." The discussion is as to the construction to be given to the words "et al.," and the effect thereof. The words, as here used, evidently mean, "and others." Therefore the notes are payable to Charles R. Whitesell and others or order, without designating whom the others are. To learn what qualities are essential to a negotiable promissory note, says Mr.

NOTE.—As to requisites to negotiability of promissory notes, see notes to Hegeler v. Comstock (3 Dak.) 18 L. R. A. 326; Siegel v. Chicago T. & Sav. Bank (Ill.) 7 L. R. A. 537.

That a note payable to a man's "estate" or "heirs" is negotiable, see Shaw v. Smith, 6 L. R. A. 348, and note, 180 Mass. 166.

Parsons, in his work on Notes and Bills (page 80), "we must bear in mind the purpose of the note, and of the law in relation to it. This is simply that the note may represent money, and do all the work of money in business transactions. For this purpose the first requisite—that thing which includes all the rest—is certainty." "Certainty," says the author, "as to the person who shall receive the money, the person or persons who are to make the payment, the amount to be paid, and the time when payment is to be made." In Story on Promissory Notes (§ 85), it is said: "In instruments designed for circulation, it is of the highest importance to know to whom its obligations apply, and from whom a title can securely be derived." In Smith v. Marland, 59 Iowa, 649, it is said: "The qualities essential to a negotiable promissory note are that it shall possess certainty as to the payor, the payee, the amount, the time of payment and the place of payment." Such is the rule uniformly laid down in all the authorities, and it does not require further citations. This case must not be confounded with notes payable in the alternative, as "to A or B;" it is a promise to pay to Charles R. Whitesell and others jointly. Neither must it be confounded with notes payable to bearer, without naming any payee, nor with the cases in which it has been held that whoever legally owns such a note may recover thereon. These notes being promises to pay Charles R. Whitesell and others jointly, Whitesell could not alone transfer them so as to convey the interest of the other payees any more than if they had been named in the notes. A note made to several persons not partners can only be transferred by the joint action of all of them. Ryhiner v. Fleickert, 92 Ill. 805, "and neither payee can, of course, indorse the names of the others without special authority." Randolph, Com. Paper, § 155.

Appellee contends that these notes are in accord with the provision of section 2085 of the Code. Turning to section 2082, we see that notes in writing, signed by the person promising "to pay to another person or his order or bearer, or to bearer only, any sum of money, are negotiable by indorsement or delivery." It will be observed that the promise must be to another person or his order or bearer, and does not dispense with the certainty of which we have been speaking as to whom that other person is. Section 2085 is as follows: "Instruments by which the maker promises to pay a sum of money in property or labor, or to pay or deliver property or labor, or acknowledges property or labor or money to be due to another, are negotiable instruments, with all the incidents of negotiability, whenever it is manifest from their terms that such was the intent of the maker; but the use of the technical words 'order' or 'bearer' alone will not manifest such intent." Here, again, the promise must be to another, and there is nothing in the section to modify the rule requiring certainty as to whom that other is. It is true, as contended, that negotiable instruments may be transferred by indorsement or delivery; but that does not aid us in determining whether these particular instruments are negotiable. It is said that Charles R. Whitesell is the only payee named. That is true, but the notes show that he is not the only person to whom payment is to be made. If it be true, as alleged in the answer, that the other persons named, together with Charles R., are in fact payees of the notes, then, surely, Charles R. is not the only payee, and could not alone transfer them. Authorities are cited in support of the claim that, if any words are used which indicate that the maker intended that the notes should be negotiable, the law will give effect to that intention, as against him. It is a sufficient answer to say that in view of the law which requires certainty in negotiable instruments as to whom the payee is, the fact that it is left uncertain rather indicates an intention that the instruments should not be negotiable. Appellee relies upon Moors v. Anderson, 8 Ind. 18. That note was payable to steamboat Juda and owners, and the court held that the word "owners," as it occurred in the note, sufficiently indicated a person, within the intent of the law. It is a familiar rule that, when a person is designated as payee, and question arises as to whom of several persons bearing the same designation was meant, evidence is admissible to show which is the payee. Parsons, Mercantile Law, 88. Under this rule it was admissible to show who was the owner of the steamboat, and hence the designation was sufficient. In Grant v. Vaughan, 8 Burr. 1516, it is held that a note payable "to ship Fortune or bearer is negotiable, under the rule that, if the name of payee be not the name of a person, as if it be the name of a ship, the instrument is payable to bearer." See also Parsons, Mercantile Law, 89. In each of these cases, a person was designated as payee,—in the one as owner of the steamboat Juda; and in the other, as bearer. These notes are payable to Charles R. Whitesell and others or order. The others are not designated by name or otherwise, and therefore it is uncertain "as to the persons who shall receive the money," "uncertain to whom its obligations apply, and from whom a title can securely be derived." We think the district court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the answer.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

If the parties are joint owners, or these trees are common property, cutting them cannot be a trespass but must be waste, and equity will not interfere to restrain waste between joint tenants, tenants in common or coparceners, unless the defendant is insolvent.

If the cutting is trespass the plaintiff must clearly establish: (1) his title; (2) that injury is irreparable.

These trees are ordinary forest trees, standing directly on the line, fed alike from the soil of both parties, and, in the absence of a different agreement, are the common property of both.

The evidence shows that the damage is not irreparable; that it can be measured in money. It shows that adequate compensation may be recovered in law.

Cowles v. Shaw, 2 Iowa, 496; Bolton v. McShane, 67 Iowa, 207; High, Inj. §§ 701, 702.

If defendant should cut down the trees along this line he would be a trespasser; plaintiff would not be entitled to enjoin him simply because he is a trespasser.

Griffin v. Bixby, supra; High, Inj. § 701, and cases cited in note 6, also § 718; Wilson v. Hughell, Morris (Iowa) 461; Waterloo v. Waterloo St. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 198.

Messrs. Mullan & Hoff, for appellee:

Trees standing and growing on a division line are common property, as to which the owners of adjoining parcels of land are tenants in common; and an action of trespass will lie by the one against the other who attempts to cut down and destroy them without the consent of his co-tenant.

Hoffman v. Armstrong, 46 Barb. 387; Griffin v. Bixby, 12 N. H. 454; Dubois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 128.

If the trees have special value and one of the co-tenants derives from them some special advantage, benefit or enjoyment, beyond the actual value of trees as trees, courts of equity will not hesitate to interfere by injunction to restrain his co-tenant from cutting down and destroying the same and depriving him of the special value, benefit and enjoyment which he derives therefrom.

Relief will not be withheld because the bill omits to charge the injury as irreparable, provided sufficient facts are alleged to satisfy the court that such would be the case.

Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152.

An injury is irreparable when it is of such a nature that the injured party cannot be adequately compensated therefor in damages, or when the damage which may result therefrom cannot be measured by any pecuniary standard.

unnecessary injury or destruction caused by negligence or unskillfulness. McCord v. Oakland Q. Min. Co. 64 Cal. 145.

The court refused an injunction where the tenant in possession owned eight twentieths of the whole, had made improvements to the amount of $2,000 and answered that he only intended to cut the wood and timber from two acres near the barn, and denied all intention to commit waste. Obert v. Obert, 5 N. J. Eq. 397.

An injunction will not lie to restrain one tenant from removing oil from a tank, since it has a market value and compensation can be had at law for the removal. Mason v. Norris, 18 Grant, Ch. 500.

A few exceptions have been made to the rule, where there are strong reasons for granting the relief.

Destruction of property by insolvent.

Insolvency of the tenant in possession was soon recognised as a ground for granting the relief (Smallman v. Onions, 3 Bro. Ch. 623), even though he was merely committing waste. Stout v. Curry, 9 West. Rep. 382, 110 Ind. 514.

It may also be granted for destruction of the common property, but not for acts which amount simply to an ouster. Durham & S. R. Co. v. Wawn, 3 Beav. 119.

So it may be granted for malicious destruction of property, but not to stay mere equitable waste. Hole v. Thomas, 7 Ves. Jr. 566.

Where the land was valuable only for timber, cutting the timber would amount to a destruction of the property and would be enjoined. Proudfoot v. Bush, 7 Grant, Ch. 518; Coffin v. Loper, 25 N. J. Eq. 444; Atkinson v. Hewitt, 61 Wis. 281.

It may be granted to restrain waste, destruction or removal of chattels out of the jurisdiction of the court. Low v. Holmes, 17 N. J. Eq. 152.

It has been granted to restrain one tenant from cutting timber growing on the land and not wanted for the necessary use of the farm. Hawley v. Clowes, 2 Johns. Ch. 122, 1 L. ed. 816.

One tenant in common will be enjoined, at the suit of his co-tenant, from digging earth for bricks on the joint property. Douglass v. Foster, 4 Grant, Ch. 819.

It will be granted where one tenant has become by agreement the occupying tenant of the other. Twort v. Twort, 16 Ves. Jr. 132.

Where one tenant was trustee for the other, his rights as tenant were subordinate to his duty as trustee, and he was restrained from cutting timber. Christie v. Saunders 2 Grant, Ch. 670.

Where one of the tenants was the mother of the others and married an insolvent, who went to reside on and manage the common property, he was restrained from selling crops until he secured the

One co-tenant will not be permitted to injure or destroy the property held in common by him and his co-tenants without the consent of all, and a court of equity will at once interfere by injunction to restrain such injury or destruction.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff owns the S.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 16, in township 90 N., of range 18 W., in Black Hawk County, and occupies it as a place of residence for himself and family. His dwelling-house, barn and other buildings are on the land described, and near its northwest corner. The defendant owns the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the quarter-section described, and the south boundary line of his land is the north boundary line of the west part of the land of plaintiff. About twenty years before the commencement of this action one Jeffers, who then owned the land now owned by plaintiff, planted along and on the north boundary line thereof, for a distance of about thirty rods, commencing at the northwest corner, a line of cottonwood trees. They have grown to a height of from thirty to sixty feet, and their trunks have a diameter, near the ground, of from one to two feet. The average space between them is about three feet. The plaintiff has attached barbed wires to the north side of the trees, thus making a wire fence. He claims that the fence is needed; that the trees are of great value to him as a wind-break; that they afford valuable protection from storm and winter winds to his buildings and stock; and that defendant has threatened to destroy the fence, and to cut down and remove the trees; and that unless restrained he will do so. The defendant claims that, by agreement with plaintiff, a division of their common boundary line was made for the purposes of fencing, by which plaintiff was to maintain a fence on the east half of the line, and the defendant on the remainder; that the trees described have thrown out roots, which extend for many feet in his land; that by reason of such roots, and the shade of the trees, a strip of his land four or five rods wide, north of the trees, has been rendered unproductive. He denies that the trees are of any value to plaintiff; claims that he has a right to cut and remove them, for the reason that they are a damage to him, and for the further reason that plaintiff has cut and taken away some of those originally planted there, and he claims the right to do the same. He admits that he had threatened and fully intended to cut down those now standing. The evidence shows that the trees are of value to plaintiff, and that they damage the defendant; also that they stand on the common boundary line. They were planted before defendant acquired title to the land he now owns. Under what agreement, if any, between the owners of the two tracts of land, they were planted, does not appear, although Jeffers and his grantees seem to have cared for them as their own. They stand upon and draw sustenance from both tracts of land, and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that they are owned by the parties to this action as tenants in common. Dubois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 124; Griffin v. Bizby, 12 N. H. 456.

When one tenant in common destroys the subject of the tenancy, he is liable to his co-tenant for the damage he thereby sustains. Dubois v. Beaver, supra. A court of equity will, by injunction, restrain one tenant in common, at the suit of another, from doing a serious injury to the common estate. 1 High, 101, § 844. It is well settled that the commission of a trespass may be restrained by injunction. Grant v. Crow, 47 Iowa, 688; 2 Story, Eq. Jur.

share of plaintiff, a female twenty-two years of age. Bates v. Martin, 12 Grant, Ch. 460.

So where landlord and tenant were tenants in common of the crop, and the landlord had been damaged more than its value by the mismanagement of the tenant, who was insolvent, the tenant was restrained from removing and selling the crop. Lewis v. Christian, 40 Ga. 187.

Where the tenants in common had only an equitable title, the legal title being in a surviving trustee, and the tenant in possession was insolvent, the court granted the injunction. Smallman v. Onions, 3 Bro. Ch. 623.

In partition suits.

Injunction may be granted to preserve the rights of the parties to a partition suit. Wesse v. Welsh, 80 N. J. Eq. 434.

But even after decree for sale in partition the tenant in possession will not be restrained from selling the crops grown on the land although he may be restrained from destruction of the property or waste. Bailey v. Hobson, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 180.

The execution of a decree for actual partition of land may be enjoined to enable the court to determine whether actual partition or sale will be most for the interest of the parties. Gash v. Ledbetter, 6 Fred. Eq. 183.

Pending the partition proceedings equity will not interfere with the possession of the premises, nor 12 L. R. A.

will it enjoin one tenant from proceeding to collect his portion of the rent due. High, 101, § 844, citing Hughes v. D'Arcy, 8 Ir. Eq. Rep. 71.

Determining water rights.

Injunction may be granted for the purpose of preserving water rights which are held in common. Bliss v. Rice, 17 Pick. 39.

So one tenant in common may be enjoined from wasting water from a common reservoir. Ballou v. Wood, 8 Cush. 42.

One tenant in common of a water-power, who also owns a dam and mill higher up the stream, will be restrained from drawing so much water from the stream at his upper mill as to destroy the water-power held in common. Kennedy v. Soovil, 13 Conn. 297.

But one tenant in common of water-power will not be restrained from occasionally using more than his share of the water where his co-tenant has no means of utilizing his share and has never sued for damages for the excessive use made by the other. Norris v. Hill, 1 Mich. 202.

Collection of judgment.

To restrain the collection of a judgment at law by one tenant in common against the other until an account can be taken, the bill must distinctly charge the insolvency of the judgment creditor. McLendon v. Hooks, 15 Ga. 533.

§§ 928, 929. It is said that an injunction will not be allowed to restrain the commission of a trespass where the recovery of damages in an action at law would be an adequate remedy for the inquiries which would result from the trespass, if committed, and that, to authorize such an injunction, the injury threatened must be irreparable. It was said in Wilson v. Mineral Point, 89 Wis. 164, that "an injury is irreparable when it is of such a nature that the injured party cannot be adequately compensated therefor in damages, or when the damages which may result therefrom cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard." It was further held in that case that the destruction of trees and shrubbery growing upon premises occupied as a home by the plaintiff would be, in a legal sense, an irreparable injury to him.

In this case the plaintiff stated that the cutting down of the trees would damage him to the amount of $200. But it does not follow that the damages would not be irreparable within the meaning of the law, nor does it appear that plaintiff is willing to suffer the damages for the sum named. The trees cannot be replaced, nor can their benefit to plaintiff, and the comfort and satisfaction he derives from them, be accurately measured by a pecuniary standard. The use which defendant purposes to make of them is not the one for which they were designed, nor the only one for which they are adapted. There are many cases where rights conflict, or where they are in dispute, in which courts of equity will not interfere by injunction to prevent an impending injury, so long as there is an adequate remedy at law for the injury threatened. But in this case there is no dispute as to the material facts involved, and the respective rights of the parties are known. The plaintiff has an interest in the trees for which he cannot be compelled, at the election of defendant, to accept a money consideration. A person is not obliged to suffer his property to be destroyed at the will of another, even though he may be able to recover ample pecuniary compensation therefor. This is especially true of property like trees, planted for and adapted to a certain use, and serving a special purpose. Their owner has an interest in them which he may protect, and to be deprived of it without his consent would be to suffer irreparable injury within the meaning of the law. It appears in this case that plaintiff has cut down and appropriated a few of the trees which at one time constituted a part of the line of trees in question, but the fact does not authorize defendant to cut down and remove the remainder. The trees cause him some damage, but not sufficient to authorize him to destroy them. The decree of the district court enjoined defendant "from tearing down or interfering with the fence on said line, and from in any manner interfering with said trees." This must be construed in connection with the injury threatened and the relief asked, to enjoin defendant from destroying or in any manner injuring the trees and fence. It was not designed to prevent him from taking care of the trees and maintaining the fence. His right to do so is as great as that of plaintiff.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

FORT SMITH & VAN BUREN BRIDGE CO. et al., Appts.,
v.

James D. HAWKINS, Tax Collector of Crawford County.

(...Ark....)

1. The same rule governs as to the boundaries on streams of water of incorporated territories and of lands of individuals.
2. The boundary of an incorporated town or city on a navigable river in Arkansas, like that of an individual proprietor, extends only to high-water mark, although the county boundary goes to the middle of the channel.
3. Only that part of a bridge across a navigable river which is above high-water mark can be taxed by the municipal corporation in Arkansas, although one half of the bridge is within the county in which the municipality is situated.

(May 23, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Crawford County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin the collection of taxes assessed on complainant's bridge. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clayton, Brizzolara & Forrester, for appellants:

The plat defining the limits of a city is construed the same as grants by deed, when the boundary is to be ascertained.

State v. Canterbury, 28 N. H. 196.

The land so granted was on the margin of the Arkansas River, a navigable stream. Navigable rivers only are meandered.

Lester, Land Laws, 714.

The boundary to lands bordering on rivers and lakes is the meandered line established by the government surveyors.

Granger v. Stuart, 1 Woolw. 88.

Therefore the common-law doctrine is not applicable to such streams.

La Plaisance Bay Harbor Co. v. Monroe Common Council, Walk. Ch. 168.

The American doctrine is that grants of

Messrs. Turner & Turner, Nimrod Turman and E. D. Peirce, for appellees:

The river being established as the boundary, it makes the City of Van Buren a riparian proprietor on the Arkansas River, and thereby extends the limits of the corporation to the middle of the Arkansas River, not only on the line of the railroad, but at every other point on the thread of the stream opposite the river front of said town.

Chancellor Kent says: "The right of sovereignty in public rivers above the flow of the 12 L. R. A.

tide is the same as in tide water; they are juris publici except that the proprietors adjoining such rivers own the soil ad flum aqua [referring to Hale, De Jure Maris, chaps. 4-6]. But grants of land bounded on rivers, or upon the margins of the same, or along the same above tide water, carry the exclusive right and title of the grantees to the center of the stream, unless the terms of the grant clearly denote the intention to stop at the edge or margin of the river."

The doctrine that the riparian owner of land is thereby the owner of the soil of the stream to its center applies to the great rivers in this country like the Mississippi, subject to the public easement of passing over the same in boats or river craft, and doing whatever is necessary to use it as a highway.

This question was never before this court for adjudication until presented in the late case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rumsey, 8 L. R. A. 559, 58 Ark. 814, although there has been an unmistakable recognition of the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership.

Warren v. Chambers, 25 Ark. 120; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Brooks, 39 Ark. 403.

An examination of the adjudged cases in which it has been sought to abrogate the common-law doctrine that the riparian proprietor on all fresh-water streams takes ad medium flum, shows that they are placed upon unsound reasons.

The first reason, viz.: that in England, whence the common-law doctrine came, there were no streams navigable in fact in which the tide did not ebb and flow, is untrue.

Camden, in his Britannica, enumerates 553 rivers and streams in England and Wales, of which probably as many as 50 are navigable, the Thames and Severn each being navigable for about 150 miles above tide water for large barges.

An inspection of Lord Hale's Treatise, "De Jure Maris," discloses that the distinction between rivers navigable in fact above tide water and rivers navigable in the strict legal sense as being arms of the sea was as familiar to the English judge as to the American jurist.

A second reason, viz.: that, in the United States, the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States has been extended to the great lakes and the large fresh-water streams, while in England 12 L. R. A.

it is limited to waters in which the tide ebbs and flows. That, as an innovation has been made in the common-law doctrine, and the old criterion discarded touching the subject of admiralty jurisdiction, that criterion should be abandoned in determining the rights of riparian owners.

The case of The Genesee Chief, 53 U. S. 13 How. 448, 13 L. ed. 1058, which is relied upon as establishing this doctrine, related alone to the question of admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes and rivers, and had not the slightest relation to or bearing on the riparian rights of persons living on the borders of our great navigable rivers.

See Jones v. Soulard, 65 U. S. 24 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 604.

A third ground is predicated on the several Acts of Congress making provision for the survey and sale of public lands bordering on public navigable rivers, and on the various federal statutes declaring, in one form or another, that the navigable waters of the United States shall be common highways and forever free.

See St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 273, 19 L. ed. 74.

It was not the purpose of Congress in these enactments to declare any new rules touching riparian proprietorship.

The remarks of the court in St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, supra, so far as they are in opposition to the common-law doctrine, are simply obiter dicta and are not authority.

Carroll v. Carroll, 57 U. S. 16 How. 287, 14 L. ed. 941. See St. Clair County v. Lovington, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 65, 23 L. ed. 62; St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S. 566, 28 L. ed. 1181; People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 351, 48 Am. Dec. 389; Mississippi River Bridge Co. v. Lonergan, 91 Ill. 515.

A fourth ground is that the bed of every fresh-water stream, which is navigable in fact, becomes the property of the State on its admission into the Union, and that the grantee of land bounded by such a stream holding under patent from the United States takes only to high-water mark.

Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565, upon which this doctrine rests, is confined to tide water. See also Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471, 13 L. ed. 220; Smith v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269.

The portion of the opinion in Barney v. Kookuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224 (1876), laying down the rule that on the great fresh-water streams the riparian proprietor's dominion extends only to high-water mark was a dictum pure and simple.

See Cooley, Const. Lim. *525, and authorities there cited.

No good purpose would be furthered by holding that the title to the soil beneath fresh-water streams navigable in fact is in the State.

See Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18; Taylor v. Armstrong, 24 Ark. 102; Packet Company v. Sorrels, 50 Ark. 466; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 664 a.

Whatever objections—real or imaginary—may exist to giving the individual riparian proprietor the ownership of the bed of the stream ad medium flum as against the public, vanishes when the riparian proprietor is a municipal corporation—vanishes, not merely because its dominion does not rest for its warrant on title, but also because a municipal corporation is, as it were, the vicegerent of the State itself.

Arkadelphia v. Windham, 49 Ark. 189; Van Buren v. Wells, 58 Ark. 868.

Public policy and the well being of the inhabitants of the corporation would seem to require that the jurisdictional limits of the City of Van Buren should be co-extensive with those of the County of Crawford on the Arkansas River.

Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 295.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this action is to enjoin the collection of the taxes, which were levied by the City of Van Buren, for the years 1886, 1887 and 1888, upon the bridge of the Fort Smith & Van Buren Bridge Company. The bridge is across the Arkansas River, and one half of it is in Crawford County, in this State, and is in the main line of the Saint Louis & San Francisco Railway Company, and is used by that company in the operation of its trains. It was assessed for taxation, for the years 1886, 1887 and 1888, by the state board of railroad commissioners as a part of the roadbed of the Railway Company, and was valued by them for that purpose at $268,000. This valuation was added to and included in the assessment of the railway of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company, and $3,980 thereof, that is to say, of the valuation of the bridge, was apportioned and certified for taxation by Van Buren for the years named. The assessor of Crawford County also assessed the one half of the bridge lying in that county, for the same years, at $100,000. The portion of the valuation of the state board of railroad commissioners which was apportioned to Van Buren and the valuation of the assessor were entered and extended upon the tax books of Crawford County for each of said years, and a municipal tax of five mills on the dollar levied by the City of Van Buren was assessed and extended against the bridge on such apportionment and the valuation of the assessor on each of said books; and the books, with the taxes so extended, were placed in the hands of the tax collector of Crawford County, with a warrant to each of them attached authorizing him to collect the same. The taxes assessed against the bridge on the apportionment made by the state board were paid. But the railway and bridge companies refused to pay the taxes assessed upon the valuation made by the assessor, and seek by this action to restrain the collection of the same. They allege that the collection of them should be restrained because they say no part of the bridge is in the City of Van Buren. On the other hand, the Collector, the defendant in the action, avers that the entire one half thereof, which is in the County of Crawford, is in that city. The court below held that so much of the bridge as is in the County of Crawford is within the City of Van Buren, and sustained the levy of taxes assessed against the same upon the valuation fixed by the assessor, and held that the taxes assessed and extended on the tax books according to apportionment made by the state board were illegal, but held that the Bridge Company was entitled to a credit on the taxes found to be lawfully assessed against the bridge for the amount of the taxes so paid, and decreed accordingly and plaintiffs appealed.

Since this court held in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Williams, 58 Ark. 58, that the bridge in question should be assessed for taxation by the assessors of the counties in which it is situated, as the property of the Bridge Company, and not by the state board as the property of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company, there is but one question in the case, and that is, Is the one half of the bridge in Crawford County subject to taxation by the City of Van Buren?

Municipal corporations can levy no taxes, general or special, unless the power to do so be plainly and unmistakably conferred. The power must be given either in express words or by necessary or unmistakable implication. It cannot be deduced by doubtful inferences from other powers, or from any consideration of convenience or advantage. Vance v. Little Rock, 80 Ark. 489; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 763, 764, 786; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. §§ 69, 90.

The statutes of this State limit the right of a municipal corporation to levy taxes to the real and personal property within the limits of such corporation. Manst. Dig. § 896. Was one half of the bridge in question in the corporate limits of the City of Van Buren?

Van Buren is an incorporated town or city in Crawford County, in this State. The boundary line of Crawford County between it and the County of Sebastian is the middle of the main channel of the Arkansas River. The river is navigable as far up as Van Buren, and beyond. The town is situated on the east bank of the river, on the north fractional half of section 25, in township 9 north and in range 33 west. This tract of land originally belonged to Thompson and Drennen. They laid off the town on it, caused a map of the town, so laid off, to be made and filed in the office of the county clerk of Crawford County in 1842. The town so laid off extended to the river. Along the bank of the river, the whole length of the town, is a strip of land marked on the map "reserved," which was not divided into lots and blocks but nevertheless forms a part of the town. This reserve does not belong to the town, but by an agreement with Thompson and Drennen, the town has been permitted to erect a wharf on it, and to collect wharfage from steamboats lying at such wharf.

The town was incorporated by Acts of the General Assembly in 1842 and 1845. The last Act declared its corporate limits to be the same metes and bounds as are designated on the plat of the town on record at the time it was enacted. Acts of 1842, pp. 172, 173; Acts of 1842-45, p. 186. The evidence clearly proves that the plat referred to in the last Act was the map filed by Drennen and Thompson in 1842. The Acts of the General Assembly of April 9, 1869, and of March 9, 1875, regulating the incorporation, organization and government of municipal corporations, made no change in the territorial limits of towns and cities incorporated at the time of their enactment, but left them as they were. Gantt, Dig. §§ 8201, 8202; Mansf. Dig. §§ 729, 730.

The bridge of the Fort Smith & Van Buren Bridge Company was erected across the river; and one half of it is in Crawford and the other half is in Sebastian County. A part of it extends over a portion of the strip of land marked on the map "reserved" and onto the block designated on the map as block 81.

In order to determine how much of the bridge is in Van Buren, it is necessary to ascertain its corporate limits on the Arkansas River. Is it high-water mark on the bank of the river in Crawford County, or is it low-water mark on said bank, or is it the middle or thread of the stream?

As a rule the same construction that is given to grants of land is given to statutes which prescribe the boundaries of incorporate territories. Cold Springs Iron Works v. Tolland, 9 Cush. 492; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 182, note 1, and cases cited. Following this rule, courts have differed as to the location of the boundaries of such territories on rivers as they have as to like boundaries of grants of land. In those States where grants of land, bounded on fresh-water rivers, carry the title of the grantee to the soil to the middle of the stream, courts hold that like boundaries of incorporated towns and cities extend to the centre of the river; while in other States, where grants of land bounded on navigable rivers, wherein the tide does not ebb and flow, carry the title of the grantee to low-water mark, courts hold that the boundaries of municipal corporations on such rivers extend to low-water mark and no further.

In Cold Springs Iron Works v. Tolland, supra, the court, following the rule stated, and saying that a grant of land, bounded on a stream not navigable, carries the exclusive right and title of the grantee to the centre of the stream, unless the terms of the grant clearly denote the intention to stop at the edge or margin, and that this is so although the monuments are described as standing on the margin or bank of the stream, held that a statute which made the west bank of Farmington River, a stream not navigable, a boundary or territory incorporated as the Town of Tolland constituted the centre of the stream, and not the edge or margin, the true boundary line.

Announcing the same doctrine and following the same rule, the court in State v. Canterbury, 28 N. H. 195, held that towns bounded by or on the Connecticut or Merrimac Rivers, or by lines up or down the rivers, extend to the centre of the rivers. In the course of its opinion, the court remarked: "We think there is much force in the suggestion of the counsel for the State, that the grants of towns to the proprietors, which are merely grants of land, would, of course, follow the ordinary rules of construction; and it could hardly be reasonable to apply a different rule, when the same land is incorporated into a town by a description entirely identical.

In Jones v. Soulard, 65 U. S. 24 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 604, the right to the land in controversy depended on the location of the eastern boundary of St. Louis. It appeared that the Town of St. Louis was incorporated in 1809, and that its eastern line as then incorporated was described as follows: "thence," meaning from Sugar Loaf, "due east to the Mississippi; from thence by the Mississippi to the place first mentioned." The question was, whether the eastern line of the corporation, as thus described, extended to the middle thread of the Mississippi River, or was it limited to the bank of the channel. Holding that grants of land bounded by fresh-water rivers confer the proprietorship on the grantees to the centre of the stream, notwithstanding the rivers are in fact navigable, the court held that the eastern line of the city was the middle thread of the Mississippi River. State v. Columbia, 27 S. C. 187.

In Pennsylvania it is well settled "that when a navigable river, which is held to be a public highway under the common law of this State, is made the boundary of a grant by the Commonwealth, the title passes to low-water mark, but no further; and that it is to small streams not navigable that the principle usque ad flum aqua applies." When the City of Wilkesbarre was incorporated, the Susquehanna River, a navigable stream, was made its boundary on the northwest. In Gilchrist's App., 100 Pa. 600, it appears that the City of Wilkesbarre attempted to collect taxes on a body of coal land lying beneath the Susquehanna River. It was contended on the part of the city that its corporate limits extended to the middle or thread of the river. But the court, following the rule as well settled in that State, as to grants of land, held that they did not extend beyond low-water mark, and that the city had no right to impose taxes on the coal land lying outside of its territorial limits. Johns v. Davidson, 16 Pa. 512.

This court has never determined the river boundary of an incorporated town or city. But in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 53 Ark. 314, 8 L. R. A. 559, it held that "the owner of land on the margin of a navigable stream in this State, holding under a grant from the United States government, does not take ad medium flum aqua, but to high-water mark." We see no good reason why the same rule should not govern in determining the boundaries of incorporated territories. The incorporation of territory, which has been conveyed to an individual, cannot change its boundary lines when the description of the same in the Act of Incorporation and the conveyance are identical. Upon principle and authority the same description defines the boundaries alike in both cases.

The rule applies in this case. The land on which Van Buren stands was originally held by Drennen and Thompson under a grant from the United States. They laid it off into town lots and blocks, streets and alleys, to the Arkansas River, and made a map of it as laid off, and filed it in the clerk's office. Before it was incorporated the high-water mark of the river in Crawford County was the boundary line of the town on the side next to the river. In 1845 the Legislature incorporated to the town the second time, and declared its corporate limits to be "the same metes and bounds as designated" on said map. The high-water mark was thereby made and is still retained, and has remained a boundary line of the incorporated territory.

So much of the bridge, therefore, as extends over the high-water mark in Crawford County is within the corporate limits of Van Buren.

This part, with the approaches thereto, should have been separately assessed, as a part of the entire bridge, by the assessor of Crawford County for taxation by the city for the years 1886, 1887 and 1888. The taxation of more than that for the municipal purposes of the City of Van Buren for the years mentioned was illegal. The city had no power to impose taxes on that part of the bridge which lay outside of its territorial limits.

The decree of the court below is therefore reversed, and this cause is remanded with instructions to the court to ascertain the value of so much of the bridge as is within the corporate limits of the City of Van Buren, at the time it was subject to be valued by the assessor for taxation for the years 1886, 1887 and 1888, and the amount of taxes that would have been due the city had it been assessed at such valuation at said times and the taxes levied by the city for the years named had been assessed against such portion according to such valuation within the times prescribed by law, and to deduct therefrom the taxes paid the city on the part of the valuation of the bridge apportioned to the city by the state board of railroad commissioners, and upon the payment by the Bridge Company of the balance remaining unpaid and of all the costs in this action, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court, to perpetually enjoin and restrain the collection of the municipal taxes that were assessed against the one half of the bridge on the assessment and valuation made by the assessor of Crawford County as before stated; and, in the event the amount ascertained to be due the city and said costs are not paid within such reasonable time, to dismiss the complaint of appellants; and, in the meantime and until such reasonable time shall expire, to make an order temporarily restraining the collection of the municipal taxes that have been assessed against the one half of the bridge as before stated; and that, in the event the court shall not be in session in time to restrain the collection, the judge thereof make an order that the temporary restraining order may be issued by the clerk upon the terms the Statute authorizes the issue of such orders.

The judgment will be entered here in favor of appellee against appellants for the costs of this appeal.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

METROPOLITAN NATIONAL BANK of Chicago, Appt.,

v.

Noble JONES et al.

(....Ill....)

Certification of a check by a bank on the payee's application releases the drawer.

(May 18, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce the drawers' alleged liability on a dishonored certified check. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Banking; effect of certification of checks.

The moment the check is certified the funds cease to be under the control of the original depositor and pass under the control of the person who procures the certification of the check drawn in his favor. First Nat. Bank of Jersey City v. Leach, 52 N. Y. 360; Thomson v. Bank of British North America, 52 N. Y. 1; Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn. Twp. 20 Pa. 92.

The prohibition in the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 5303, against certifying any check drawn upon a national banking association, unless there is a sufficient deposit at the time to meet the check, does not affect the validity of the contract as between the parties. Thompson v. St. Nicholas Nat. Bank, 113 N. Y. 325, 47 Hun, 621. See National Bank of Xenia v. Stewart, 107 U. S. 673, 37 L. ed. 322; Union Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 631, 25 L. ed. 128; National Bank of Genesee v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 90, 26 L. ed. 443.

The certifying bank becomes bound for its payment.

Messrs. Hamline, Scott & Lord, for appellant:

The precise question presented in this case has never been passed on by our supreme court, but as early as 1860, our supreme court turned its back on the theories entertained by the courts of New York on the subject of checks, and took advanced ground, holding that the check of a depositor upon his banker, delivered to another for value, transfers to that other the title to so much of the deposit as the check calls for, which may again be transferred to another by delivery, and when presented to the banker he becomes the holder of the money to the use of the owner of the check, and is bound to account to him for that amount; provided the party drawing the check has funds to that amount on deposit subject to his check at the time it is presented.

ment, and cannot defeat the right of the holder upon the ground that the drawer has no funds on deposit. Born v. Indianapolis First Nat. Bank, 7 L. R. A. 443, and note, 128 Ind. 73.

The payee of a check who receives it from the drawer in the same place where the bank on which it is drawn is located releases the latter, where he presents it and has it certified on the day on which he receives it. Continental Nat. Bank v. Cornhauser (Ill. App.) 4 Bkg. L. J. 116.

One who accepts a certified check in the usual course of business does not assume the risk of insolvency of the bank upon which it is drawn, but in case it proves insolvent he may look to the drawer for payment. Born v. Indianapolis First Nat. Bank, supra.

The acceptance by a creditor of a certified check does not ipso facto constitute payment. Ibid.; Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 643, 19 L. ed. 1012. See also note to National Bank of Commerce v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. (Minn.) 9 L. R. A. 233.

Muan v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35; Fourth Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 68 Ill. 402.

Holders of such checks may bring action upon them in their own name.

Chicago M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Stanford, 28 Ill. 168.

After the check has passed to the hands of a bona fide holder, it is not in the power of the drawer to countermand the order of payment.

Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 60 Ill. 212.

The check operates to transfer the sum therein named to the payee, provided the depositor has on deposit a sufficient sum to pay the check at the time it is presented for payment.

Merchants Nat. Bank v. Bitteringer, 20 Ill. App. 29; National Bank of America v. Indiana Bkg. Co. 1 West. Rep. 354, 114 Ill. 492; Woodburn v. Woodburn, 3 West. Rep. 85, 115 Ill. 480.

The debt is only paid when the money is received from the bank on which the check is drawn or the maker is released by the laches of the payee. In Illinois laches is not imputed unless there has been unreasonable delay in presenting the check for payment and giving notice to drawer of its nonpayment.

Stevens v. Park, 73 Ill. 888; Willette v. Paine, 43 Ill. 438.

Unreasonable delay is interpreted by our courts to mean that the check must not be presented for payment at the bank on which the same is drawn later than during business hours of the next day after the receipt of the same, providing the bank is located in the same town in which the check is delivered.

Strong v. King, 35 Ill. 9; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 238.

In view of these rulings as to the effect of the giving of a plain check, there can be no difference between a certified and an uncertified check as regards the liability of the drawer.

Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

The check, though certified and used as money, still retains all the characteristics of an inland bill of exchange; being such, the drawer is liable for the amount after notice of presentation, and protest for nonpayment.

Rounds v. Smith, 42 Ill. 245; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 497.

Messrs. Runyan & Runyan, for appellees:

If the holder of the check presents it, and consents to accept certification by the Bank, then the holder is clearly absolved from further liability.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit in assumpsit, brought by the Metropolitan National Bank of Chicago against Noble Jones, Edward S. Jones and Walter Metcalf, copartners doing business under the firm name of Noble Jones, to recover the amount of a bank check for $1,540, drawn by the defendants on the Traders' Bank of Chicago, payable to the order of the plaintiff. The defendants pleaded non-assumpsit, and on trial before the court, a jury being waived, the issues were found for the defendants, and the court, after denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, gave judgment in favor of the defendants for costs.

The facts appear by stipulation, and are, in substance, as follows: On the 1st day of October, 1888, after the commencement of banking hours in the morning of that day, the defendants, being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,540, gave to the plaintiff their check on the Traders' Bank of Chicago, as follows:

"Edw. S. Jones, $1,540.00. Walter Metcalf.

"Noble Jones.

"Chicago, Cook Co., Ill., Oct. 1, 1888.

"Pay to the order of Metrop. Nat'l Bank fifteen hundred and forty dollars.

"To Traders' Bank,

"Chicago, Ill.

"No. 18, 128.

Noble Jones."

On the same day, and during banking hours, the plaintiff sent said check by one of its collectors to the Traders' Bank, and asked said bank to certify it, which was done by writing across the face of it as follows:

"Certified. 10, 1, 1888. Traders' Bank of Chicago. Charles G. Fox."

The next morning, during banking hours, but before clearing-house hours, the plaintiff sent said check by its collector to the Traders'

Bank, and presented it for and demanded payment, which was refused. Thereupon, on the same day, and during banking hours, the plaintiff protested said check for nonpayment, and sent notice of dishonor to the defendants. On the morning said check was presented for payment, and before it was presented, and before clearing-house hours, the Traders' Bank became insolvent, and suspended payment, and its assets were subsequently placed in the hands of a receiver, who has since had possession thereof. Said receiver has paid the creditors of said bank dividends at different times, those paid to the plaintiff amounting to $698, leaving a balance, principal and interest, due on said check at the time of the trial of $961.70. At the time said check was drawn, at the time it was certified and at the time payment was demanded the defendants had sufficient funds in the Traders' Bank to their credit to pay the check, and, if payment had been demanded instead of certification, said bank would have paid it. Upon these facts the counsel for the plaintiff submitted to the court the following proposition, to be held as the law in the decision of the case, which was refused: "The court holds, as a proposition of law, that when the holder of a check drawn upon a bank, situated in the same city as the holder, on the day of its issue takes said check to said bank and asks said bank to certify said check, which said bank certifies by marking 'Certified' on the face thereof, and the day following, during bank hours, presents said check to said bank for payment, and the bank refuses payment thereof, having become insolvent and passed into the hands of a receiver before banking hours of said day, and the holder of said check at once, and during banking hours of said day, gives notice of such dishonor to the drawer of said check, said certification does not release the drawer of said check, although at the time of the making and certification of said check the drawer had sufficient funds to his credit in said bank to pay the same, and, if payment had been demanded by the holder instead of certification, such bank could not have refused to pay the same."

The only question presented by this appeal is the one raised by the foregoing proposition, viz., whether the plaintiff, by obtaining certification of said check, released the drawers. A check being payable immediately and on demand, the holder can only present it for payment and the bank can fulfill its duty to its depositor only by paying the amount demanded. In other words, the holder has no right to demand from the bank anything but payment of the check, and the bank has no right, as against the drawer, to do anything else but pay it. It follows that there is no such thing as "acceptance" of checks, in the ordinary sense of the term, for "acceptance" ordinarily implies that the drawer requests the drawee to pay the amount at a future day, and the drawee "accepts" to do so, thereby becoming the principal debtor, and the drawer becoming his surety. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1601. If, then, the holder, on making presentment of the check, instead of demanding and receiving payment, has the check certified and retains it in his possession, he enters into a new and express contract with the bank not within the scope of the legal relations of the parties, nor within the presumed intention of the drawer. By certification, the bank enters into an absolute undertaking to pay the check when presented at any time within the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations. The transaction, as between the holder and the bank, is substantially the same, in legal effect, as though the holder had received payment, and had deposited the money with the bank, and received a certificate of deposit therefor. The liability of the bank, after certification, is independent of the question of its possession of the requisite amount of funds of the drawer; it being, by the act of certification, estopped to deny the possession of sufficient funds. Another result of the transaction is that the bank thereby becomes entitled to, and if its business is properly conducted actually does, charge the amount of the check to the account of the drawer at the time of the certification; thus in reality appropriating to the payment of the check the necessary amount of the money on deposit to the credit of the drawer, precisely the same as though the check were paid. As between the bank and drawer, certification has the same effect as payment, the funds representing the amount of the check being just as effectually withdrawn from the control of the drawer, and the indebtedness from the bank to the depositor created by the deposit being just as effectually satisfied to that amount in one case as in the other. The question whether this change in the rights and relations of the parties should be held to discharge the drawer from further liability on the check has not, so far as we are aware, ever been before this court for decision, but the great weight of authority, as found in the decisions of courts of other jurisdictions and in the treatises of law-writers of the greatest learning and ability, is in favor of the conclusion that the drawer is discharged. Mr. Daniel, in the section of his treatise above cited, lays it down as the rule that the bank, by certifying the check, becomes the principal and only debtor; that the holder, by taking a certificate of the check from the bank, instead of requiring payment, discharges the drawer; and that the check then circulates as the representative of so much cash in bank payable on demand to the holder. The question is very elaborately and learnedly discussed in 1 Morse, Banks and Banking, 8d ed. § 414 et seq., and the same conclusion reached, the following being a portion of the reasoning there adopted: "The drawer can no longer sue, though the bank should finally refuse to pay the check, for he has originally only a right to demand that the check shall be duly paid on presentment, and his action lies for the damage resulting to him or to his credit from not having his debt duly discharged in the manner he has led his creditor to suppose would be sufficient. But if the holder waives his right to immediate payment, by expressly asking for or even by accepting the offer of a certification by the bank, it follows that, since his act acquits the debt due him from the drawer, the drawer can thereafter have no cause or basis whatsoever on which to sue. The matter is voluntarily taken out of his hands by the other parties, who make their arrangements to suit their own convenience. Even if the drawer has suggested or requested the arrangement, the assent of the payee and holder must be regarded as at his sole risk. He is not obliged to take the bank's promise in place of the drawer's indebtedness. The promise of the bank on the drawer's account, accepted as satisfactory by the creditor, discharges the debtor, and at the same time deprives him of all further concern or possible right of action in the premises." See also Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 436. This question was before the Court of Appeals of New York in First Nat. Bank of Jersey City v. Leach, 53 N. Y. 850, and it was there held that, where a holder of a check presents it and procures it to be certified by the bank instead of being paid, such certification is, as between the holder and the drawer, a payment, and discharges the drawer from liability. In discussing the grounds upon which its decision is based, the court says: "When the drawee accepts, it is an appropriation of the funds, pro tanto, to the service and use of the payee or other person holding the bill, so that the amount ceases henceforth to be the money of the drawer, and becomes that of the payee or other holder in the hands of the acceptor. It is entirely clear that the acceptance of a time draft, before due, does not operate as a payment as respects the drawer. Its only effect is to make the acceptor the primary party to pay the draft. But the parties to a certified check, due when certified, occupy a different position. There the money is due and payable when the check is certified. The bank virtually says that the check is good. 'We have the money of the drawer here ready to pay it. We will pay it now, if you will receive it.' The holder says: 'No; I will not take the money. You may certify the check, and retain the money for me until this check is presented.' The law will not permit a check when due to be thus presented, and the money to be left with the bank for the accommodation of the holder, without discharging the drawer. The money being due, and the check presented, it is his own fault if the holder declines to receive the pay, and for his own convenience has the money appropriated to that check, subject to its future presentation at any time within the Statute of Limitations." See also Essex County Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 7 Biss. 198.

It seems to us very clear, both upon principle and authority, that the plaintiff in this case, by obtaining certification of their check, discharged the defendants from all liability thereon as drawers, and that the subsequent presentation of the check for payment, though on the next business day after the check was issued, did not revive or in any manner affect the defendants' liability.

But it is said that a different rule was laid down by this court in Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Ill. 283; Rounds v. Smith, Id. 245, and Brown v. Lickie, 43 Ill. 497. It will be found, on examination, that in each of those cases certification of the check was obtained by the drawer before delivery to the payee, and that no presentment was made by the holder until made in due course for payment. It is easy to see that an essentially different rule should apply in a case of that kind. The fact that the drawer, before delivering the check, gets the bank to certify it, in no way changes its essential nature as a check, or affects the drawer's liability in case, on due presentation for payment, the paper is dishonored. The reasoning of the opinion in the above-mentioned cases should be restricted in its application to the facts appearing in those cases, and as applied to those facts, it is doubtless correct and should be followed. But it cannot, and, as we may assume, was not intended to, apply to cases like the present, where the holder has himself made presentment of the check, and, instead of receiving payment, as he might and should have done, has chosen rather to accept, in lieu of payment, an express executory agreement by the bank to pay the check to the holder when presented for payment at any time thereafter.

Much effort is made by counsel to show that, to be consistent with the doctrine established by the case of Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 85, and in the numerous cases in which that decision has been followed, we must hold that the defendants were not released from liability by the certification of the check. In Munn v. Burch we held, contrary to the rule recognized in many of the States, that a depositor, by delivering to another his check on his banker for value, transfers to the payee of the check and his assigns so much of the deposit as the check calls for, and that on presentation of the check for payment, the banker becomes liable to the holder for that amount, provided the drawer has on deposit at the time a sufficient sum applicable to that purpose to pay the check. Accordingly, if the banker refuses to pay the check on presentment, he becomes liable to an action by the holder to recover its amount. It follows that the giving of the check becomes, at least after presentment, an assignment to the holder of a sufficient amount of the deposit to pay the check, and therefore a definite appropriation of that sum to its payment binding upon all the parties to the check. The argument sought to be made, if we understand it, is that the certification of the check is a no more effectual appropriation of the fund on deposit to the payment of the check than was already made by the act of the drawer in giving the check, and therefore that one of the chief grounds upon which the rule adopted in other States, that certification releases the drawer, is based, fails or is inapplicable here. If the mere fact of such appropriation, however made, is the test by which to determine whether the drawer has been released or not, there may be force in the argument. We do not understand, however, that such is the case. Some of the authorities, it is true, allude to and dwell upon that circumstance as possessing very considerable significance, but we do not understand that any of them make it the test or basis of the rule. The rule laid down in Munn v. Burch is based upon the implied agreement on the part of the banker to pay out the money deposited to the holders of the depositor's checks, at such times and in such sums as the depositor sees fit, by his checks, to order, and such agreement is held to be so far available to the holder of the depositor's check as to enable him, after the check has been duly presented for payment and payment refused, to bring suit against the banker n his own name, and recover the amount of the check. The banker, as the result of his implied agreement, becomes the principal debtor, but the drawer is still liable, at least as surety, and is at liberty at any time, by paying and taking up the check, to reinvest himself with the legal title to the money on deposit. The appropriation of the fund, then, so far as any definite appropriation of it can, under the circumstances, be said to be made, is only conditional, and follows in strict accordance with the terms of the contract between the parties, and must be regarded as one of the consequences contemplated by them at the time the check was drawn. But where the holder of the check, on presenting it to the banker, instead of demanding and receiving payment, as the parties contemplated and as is his legal duty, requests and obtains certification, and retains the check in his own hands, wholly different rights are obtained, and consequently different rules of law are applicable. The appropriation of the deposit to the payment of the check then becomes absolute, and the holder enters into new contractual relations with the banker, not contemplated or authorized by the drawer, and which place the fund appropriated wholly beyond his control and out of his reach. Even viewing the drawer as surety, the new contract between the creditor and the principal debtor, affecting as it does the character of the debt and the time and manner of payment, should of itself be held, upon well-settled principles of law, to be sufficient to discharge his liability as surety. But, whether the decision of the case should be placed upon this ground or not, the presentment of the check for payment and its dishonor on the one hand, and its presentment and certification on the other, involve legal rights, and invoke the application of legal rules, so essentially different that the doctrine of the case of Munn v. Burch, which is controlling where payment is demanded and refused, can have no relevancy to or controlling effect, even by analogy, in a case where the holder gets the check certified. We are of the opinion that no error was committed in refusing to hold the proposition submitted by the plaintiff as the law in the decision of the case, and that the appellate court properly affirmed the judgment.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of respondents in a suit brought to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Anderson for appellant.

Mr. John M. Hamilton for appellees.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill originally filed in the Superior Court of Cook County on February 7, 1888, by the appellant against one John Williams, for the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land. On March 26, 1888, the death of John Williams was suggested, and, he having died intestate, a supplemental bill was filed making his widow, heirs and administratrix parties defendant. A demurrer filed to the supplemental bill was sustained, and final decree entered dismissing the bill for want of equity. On March 11, 1885, a written contract was entered into between George A. Du Puy, an attorney-at-law, and the said John Williams, by the terms of which Du Puy agreed to take all such steps as might be necessary to perfect the title of Williams to certain lots in Ravenswood, in Cook County, by filing bills to remove clouds, procuring releases, holding possession by repairing fences and posting sale-boards, etc., and to do all the work incident to carrying out the contract, and that he should not receive any remuneration of any sort except that he should have the option to buy or sell said lots as therein set forth, and should not be required to furnish any money; and Williams agreed to furnish money to discharge liens, redeem from tax sales, pay trustee's charges, and costs necessary to set aside tax titles; and that Du Puy, in consideration of the services to be rendered by him, should have the sole privilege of purchasing any one or more of said lots, or of effecting a sale of any one or more of them to such party as he might desire, at the price of $500 each, for the space of eighteen months from the time when everything necessary to make the title perfect in Williams shall have finally been done, said price to be paid in cash, or one quarter thereof in cash and the balance in three years, and to be secured by mortgage on the premises, or "said sale may be upon any other terms which said John Williams may deem satisfactory to himself." The contract also contains provisions that Williams will pay all taxes and special assessments due when the sale is made, and will furnish to the purchaser an abstract of title, and will convey said lot or lots by deed covenanting against his own acts, and containing "usual release of all right of dower and homestead which any person may have in any one or more of said lots so sold." The bill sets forth the contract in full, and alleges that on December 28, 1886, Du Puy, for value received, duly assigned in writing to the complainant, Sloan, all his right, title and interest in said contract, and rights and benefits thereunder, and that, by virtue of such assignment, all the rights and interests of Du Puy accrued to the complainant. The bill further avers that Williams was bound, under the agreement and the assignment thereof, on the payment or tender to him of $500, to convey to complainant, by deed "which should contain the usual release of all right of dower and homestead which any person might have in or to said lot;" that, at different times in the spring and summer of 1887, complainant tendered to Williams, in his own name and in that of Du Puy, said sum of $500, and demanded that he furnish an abstract of title, "and also that he so deliver to your orator such a deed, as above specified." The bill also offers to bring the $500 into court in payment for "the said conveyance, as aforesaid."

Executory contracts which stipulate solely for

The main ground of objection to the bill is that the contract which it seeks to enforce is one which calls for the personal services and skill of one of the parties thereto, and therefore is not assignable. We think that this objection is well taken, and that the demurrer to the bill was properly sustained. Du Puy was a lawyer by profession, and, by the terms of the contract, was required to make use of his professional skill in perfecting the title to the lots by instituting and carrying on legal proceedings to remove clouds, by procuring releases, and by the use of other methods. The contract itself upon its face does not provide for any assignment of it. It is well settled that "contracts in which the personal acts and qualities of one of the contracting parties form a material ingredient are, in general, not assignable." 2 Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. p. 1868. Engagements for personal services requiring skill, science or peculiar qualifications may not be assigned. Devlin v. New York, 68 N. Y. 8.

A party who thus agrees to use his personal skill and knowledge, and has been contracted with by reason of the trust and confidence placed in him personally, cannot, while the agreement is still executory, substitute another in his place by assignment, in order to perform the service, without the consent of the other contracting party. Flanders v. Lamphear, 9 N. H. 201; Bethlehem v. Annis, 40 N. H. 34; Burger v. Rice, 8 Ind. 125; 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1275, note 2.

The granting of the specific performance of a contract is a matter of "sound judicial discretion, controlled by established principles of equity, and exercised upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case." 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1404. Such discretion will not ordinarily be exercised in favor of the specific enforcement of contracts for personal services. 8 Parsons, Cont. marg. p. 387; Fry, Spec. Perf. 8d ed. pp. 43, 96; Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28. It is true that, after the contract has been executed by the person agreeing to perform such personal services or exercise such personal skill, he may assign the right to recover compensation. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1275, note 2.

But the bill in the present case is indefinite in its allegations as to the complete performance of the contract by Du Puy before the assignment of it to Sloan. The contract requires steps to be taken to perfect the title of five lots. The right to purchase any one of the lots for $500 was dependent upon the final securing of a perfect title to them all. The bill alleges that the title to one of these lots was "under a cloud by certain tax sales and alleged tax titles," and that a bill in chancery was filed against "the pretended owner of the said pretended tax titles for the purpose of removing the same." It does not appear from the bill that the decree which was obtained was a decree removing the tax titles from all the five lots. Nor does it sufficiently appear from the allegations of the bill that there were no other clouds than tax titles upon the lots in question. The bill shows affirmatively that the assignment was made before the final termination of the proceeding to remove a tax title from one of the lots.

Moreover, the supplemental bill proceeds upon the theory that Mrs. Williams, the widow, was obliged to release her dower in the lot selected by the appellant after her husband's death. She did not sign the contract made by Du Puy with her husband. Where a husband makes a written contract, in which his wife does not join, to sell a piece of land, and dies after the payment to him of all the purchase money, but before he has executed a deed, the Statute authorizes a court of chancery to make an order compelling his executor or administrator to execute and deliver a deed to the purchaser (1 Starr & C. Ann. Stat. p. 566; Rev. Stat. chap. 29, §§ 2, 3); but the widow cannot be compelled to join in such deed so as to release her dower in the premises. If the husband has covenanted that his wife's dower shall be released, the heirs may be liable upon the covenant in case the widow enforces her dower right against the premises (Bostwick v. Williams, 86 Ill. 65); but the widow cannot be deprived of her dower otherwise than by her voluntary conveyance thereof in the mode prescribed by the Statute. Rev. Stat. chap. 41, § 16; Francisco v. Hendricks, 28 Ill. 64.

The decree of the Superior Court is affirmed.

the special personal services, skill or knowledge of a contracting party, are not assignable. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. 284, citing Weire v. Davenport, 11 Iowa, 49; Wheelock v. Lee, 64 N. Y. 242; *Hoyt v. ## INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CITIZENS STREET R. CO. et al., Appts.,
v.

Charles F. ROBBINS, Admr., etc., of Henry
M. Catherwood, Deceased.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Although the common-law right of the administrator to dispose of decedent's personal property does not exist and the terms of an order of court allowing property to be disposed of at private sale must be strictly complied with, yet an approval of the sale by the court is not necessary to pass the title if the court's order does not require a confirmation; the title passes upon the purchaser's compliance with the terms of the sale.
2. A private sale, by an administrator, of personal property of the decedent upon a credit of ten years with the purchaser's individual note as security is void if made under an order of the court which permits a private sale but directs the taking of good and sufficient security for payment of purchase money without naming the time of credit to be allowed, where the statute only allows a credit of one year.
3. Before a corporation can safely permit a transfer, upon its books, of stock which belonged to a deceased person, and which it knows has been directed by order of court to be sold by the administrator at private sale, it should ascertain whether or not such a sale has been made under the order as vests title in the purchaser; if it fails to do so it is liable to make good any loss occasioned by its permitting the transfer.
4. One who in good faith and without notice purchases in the market a certificate of stock which has been wrongfully issued by the corporation in lieu of certificates which belonged to a decedent's estate and which were not legally sold and disposed of by the administrator, receives a good title as against the decedent's estate if there was nothing on the face of the certificate to put him on inquiry or to give him notice of the infirmity of the title. Such purchaser cannot be required to make an examination of the records to ascertain the validity of the title before he can safely purchase it.
5. Permitting a paper to be read in evidence which was set out in the complaint, and thus made a part of the record in the cause, cannot be detrimental to the objecting party so as to constitute reversible error.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The amended complaint in this cause consists of two paragraphs. The first alleges substantially, among other things, that Henry H. Catherwood, deceased, at the time of his death was the owner of 308 shares, of the par value of $100 each, of the capital stock of the Citizen's Street Railway Company; that he died intestate on the 31st day of August, 1873, leaving as his only surviving heirs-at-law Lucy D. Catherwood, his widow, since married to one Phelps, and two infant children, namely, Ellen B. and John C. Catherwood; that said Lucy D. Catherwood was duly appointed and qualified as the administratrix of the estate of the said Henry H. Catherwood, deceased, and on the 12th day of July, 1878, upon petition to the Circuit Court of Marion County, procured the following order from said court, namely:

"Comes now Lucy D. Catherwood, administratrix of Henry H. Catherwood's estate, and files her petition praying that she be allowed to dispose of 308 shares of the stock of the Citizen's Street Railway Company of Indianapolis, of the par value of $100 per share, and which has been appraised at the value of fifteen cents on the dollar, and to sell the same at private sale for the appraised value thereof; and now the court having heard said petition and being fully advised in the premises and satisfied that the interests of said estate will be best served by selling the same at private sale, the said administratrix is therefore ordered and empowered to sell the said stock at private sale for the appraised value thereof, taking good and sufficient security for the payment of the purchase money; and said administratrix is further ordered to make a return of her proceedings within ninety days from this date."

That the administratrix made no sale of said stock whatever pursuant to the terms of said order, and made no sale of said stock in compliance with the terms of the statutes of the State of Indiana regulating the sale of personal property of a decedent's estate at private sale; nor did she make any sale of said stock at public sale; that she, without any authority so to do, assigned and delivered to one John Carlisle said certificate of stock, without receiving any pay therefor, and without taking any security of any sort for the payment of the purchase money therefor, taking merely as evidence of said attempted sale, and of the supposed indebtedness therefor, the promissory note of

Carlisle for $6,160, due ten years from date, no part of which note has ever been paid; that no return of said attempted sale to Carlisle, nor of any sale of said stock, nor of the proceedings of the administratrix in reference thereto, was ever made to the court, and no entry in relation thereto was ever made; that after the attempted sale to Carlisle, the administratrix made out, under oath, a return of said sale, to the effect that she had sold said stock to John Carlisle for the sum of $6,160 for cash; but the same was never filed or approved by the court; that long after the attempted transfer of said stock to Carlisle the Street Railway Company, upon his request, wrongfully issued certificates for said stock to him, and that he, about the year 1875, sold and assigned the same to appellant Tom. L. Johnson, who bought the same with knowledge that they were issued in lieu of the certificates formerly held by Henry H. Catherwood, deceased; and that said stock had belonged to his estate, and with knowledge of the order for the sale of the same above set out, and with knowledge that no return of said sale had been made and confirmed by the court; that at the time he so purchased said stock he was a stockholder and director in said Street Railway Company; that said Street Railway Company has declared dividends in a large sum, which have been paid to the said Carlisle and the said Tom. L. Johnson, and that before the commencement of this suit the appellee demanded said stock of the appellants and each of them, which they each refused to surrender.

The second paragraph of the amended complaint does not differ materially from the first, except in that it alleges that on the 16th day of July, 1878, the Citizen's Street Railway Company, upon the request of Carlisle, having knowledge of the fact that said stock belonged to the estate of Henry H. Catherwood, and having knowledge of the pending administration of said estate and of the order of sale of said stock and the terms thereof, and having knowledge of the fact that no return of any sale under said order had as yet been made to the court, wrongfully issued certificates of stock to Carlisle, who sold and assigned the same to Johnson.

To this complaint the appellant the Citizen's Street Railway Company filed an answer consisting of three paragraphs. The third paragraph avers, substantially, that on the 16th day of July, 1878, Lucy D. Catherwood, as the administratrix of the estate of Henry H. Catherwood, obtained the order set out in the complaint, authorizing her to sell the 308 shares of the capital stock of the Citizen's Street Railway Company named in the complaint; that said stock was represented by certificates numbered 96, 97, 98, 99, 100 and 101, for fifty shares each, issued to H. H. Catherwood November 18, 1867, certificates numbered 38, 35 and 36 for one share each, issued to E. B. Martindale February 18, 1865, and indorsed in blank by Martindale, and certificate numbered 87 for five shares, issued to R. B. Catherwood February 18, 1865, which was indorsed in blank by said Catherwood; that said Lucy D. Catherwood, as authorized and empowered as such administratrix to sell said stock at private sale, made the following indorsement upon each of said certificates numbered 96, 97, 98, 99, 100 and 101:

"I hereby transfer all my interest in the within stock to John Carlisle, July 16, 1878. Lucy D. Catherwood."

"For value received I assign and transfer to John Carlisle three hundred shares of the capital stock of the Citizen's Street Railway Company, this July 16, 1878. Lucy Catherwood, Adm'rx of H. H. Catherwood;"

—and upon certificates numbered 83, 85 and 86 she made the following indorsement:

"I hereby transfer all my interest in the within stock to John Carlisle, July 16, 1878."

"Lucy D. Catherwood."

"For value received I assign and transfer to John Carlisle three shares of the Capital Stock of the Citizen's Street Railway Company this 16th day of July, 1878."

"E. B. Martindale, by Lucy D. Catherwood, Atty. in Fact,"

—and a similar indorsement on certificate numbered 87, and delivered the said certificates to John Carlisle, to be brought by him to the office of said Company, and to have the same transferred to him as the owner thereof on the books of said Company; that said Carlisle brought said stock to the office of the Company and requested that the same be transferred to him, by canceling the said certificates and issuing new certificates to him in lieu thereof; that the Company caused the records of the Marion Circuit Court to be examined and ascertained that said administratrix had full power to dispose of said stock at private sale, as set forth in the complaint and relying upon the order of the court and the indorsements made by said administratrix and on the fact that said certificates, so indorsed, were in the possession of said Carlisle, and believing him to be the owner and purchaser of said stock, made such transfer of said stock to him and canceled said certificates and issued to him in lieu thereof a new certificate, numbered 185 for 808 shares of stock.

The appellant Johnson filed an answer consisting of four paragraphs. The third paragraph avers substantially that the stock in controversy was represented by certificate number 185, issued by the Citizen's Street Railway Company to John Carlisle, on the 17th day of July, 1878, and in whose name the stock was then standing on the books of said Company; that said stock was indorsed by said Carlisle, and had been pledged to the First National Bank of Indianapolis by him, or by someone in his behalf, and was so held by said bank at the time appellant purchased the same; that at the time of said purchase he had no knowledge where said stock came from or who its previous owner had been; that at the time of the transaction between Carlisle, the Citizen's Street Railway Company and Lucy D. Catherwood, he was a citizen of the State of Kentucky, and had no connection with or interest in said Company, and had no knowledge or information of its affairs, and purchased and paid for said stock without any notice or knowledge whatever of the claim of any other person thereto, believing it to be, as it purported to be, a genuine certificate of the ownership of 808 shares of the capital stock of said Company; that he denies that he had any knowledge that said certificate had been issued in lieu of certificates formerly owned or held by Henry H. Catherwood, or that it had been owned by his estate, or that any order had been made for the sale of any stock belonging to said estate.

The fourth paragraph avers substantially the same facts averred in the third answer of the Citizen's Street Railway Company, above set out, and in addition thereto that the administratrix permitted the stock to be and remain in the name of John Carlisle, and authorized him to treat said stock as his own property, and hold him out to the public as the owner thereof; that said Carlisle, or someone in his behalf, pledged said stock to the First National Bank of Indianapolis as the owner thereof, to secure his individual indebtedness to said bank; that the said administratrix made no objection thereto, but on the contrary made return to the Marion Circuit Court, on oath, that she had sold said stock to Carlisle for cash, and filed the same in the records of said court where the settlement of said estate was pending; that he afterwards purchased said stock of said bank, and, at the time he purchased the same, he was induced to believe, and did believe, from the conduct of said administratrix, that said bank held said certificate from Carlisle as the owner thereof, and that he had no knowledge or information as to any claim thereto by the estate of Henry H. Catherwood; that at the time he purchased the same he had no knowledge or information that the same had been issued in lieu of the stock formerly held by Henry H. Catherwood or his estate, and no knowledge or information of the legal proceedings set up in the complaint.

To each of these answers the court overruled a demurrer. Upon issues formed, the cause was tried by the court at special term, resulting in a finding and judgment in favor of the appellants. Upon appeal to the general term the judgment was reversed, upon which latter ruling this appeal is prosecuted.

The first question demanding our consideration relates to the rulings of the court at special term, in overruling the demurrer to these several answers; and first in order is the third paragraph of the separate answer of the Citizen's Street Railway Company.

The capital stock in the Citizen's Street Railway Company owned by Henry H. Catherwood at the time of his death was personal property. Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. 11th ed. pp. 590-596; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 557-560; 1 Rev. Stat. 1876, § 4152, p. 757, § 10.

Upon the death of Henry H. Catherwood the stock descended to his heirs-at-law, subject to the right of his administrator to subject the same to sale, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State. The common-law right of the administrator to sell and dispose of personal property does not exist in this State. Sales of such property must be made in the manner prescribed by our statutes upon the subject. In the absence of an order from the proper court, the sale must be public, and where a sale is made at private sale, under the order of the court, it must be made in substantial compliance with the order. Weyer v. Franklin Second Nat. Bank, 57 Ind. 198; Williams v. Perrin, 78 Ind. 57; 2 Rev. Stat. 1876, § 48, p. 509, § 60, p. 512; Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 2275-2289.

It is contended by the appellee that in cases of private sales, made under the order of a court, no title passes until such sale is reported and approved by the court. In this position we think he is in error. The Statute authorizing the private sale of personal property of the decedent by an administrator is most useful where the property is of a perishable nature, such as can best be disposed of in the public market, or such as would probably be sacrificed at a public sale.

In view of the fact that the courts are not in session, in many of the counties of the State, more than six months in the year, the construction contended for by the appellees would in a great measure destroy the usefulness of the Statute. Such a construction would render it inconvenient, if not impossible, to sell in the open market. It would be utterly impossible to sell a stock of goods by retail, at private sale, however apparent it might be that a public sale would result in a loss to estate. We are of the opinion that where the order of the court does not require a confirmation, if the sale is made in substantial compliance with the order of the court, the title passes to the purchaser upon his compliance with the terms of the sale. Hobson v. Ewan, 62 Ill. 146; Stow v. Kimball, 28 Ill. 93; Moffitt v. Moffitt, 69 Ill. 649.

Doubtless in all cases the court may in its discretion require, by its order, that the sale shall be reported and confirmed in order to pass title to the property. Williams v. Perrin, supra.

It is also probably true that when there is any material deviation from the order to sell no title would pass until such sale was reported and confirmed by the court.

In this case, however, there seems to have been no attempt to comply with the order made for the sale of the stock in controversy at private sale. The sale was on a credit of ten years, whereas the administratrix had no power to give a credit exceeding twelve months. 2 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 610.

The order of the court required the administrator to take good and sufficient security for the purchase price of the stock, but instead of following the order she took the individual note of John Carlisle without security. This attempted sale is no better than if there had been no order of the court. The sale to Carlisle, or a credit of ten years without any security, was not a sale under the order procured by the administratrix, and was in our opinion void and vested no title.

The Citizen's Street Railway Company had notice that the stock in question belonged to and was part of the estate of Henry H. Catherwood. It also had notice that the Marion Circuit Court had acquired jurisdiction over this property and had made an order to sell the same at private sale. Indeed, the answer discloses the fact that it had examined the proceeding under which the attempted sale to Carlisle was made. We do not think the Company exercised that degree of diligence required by the law when it stopped with the examination of the order of sale. Before canceling the stock held by the estate of Catherwood it should have gone further and ascertained whether such a sale had been made under that order as vested title in Carlisle. It was its duty before canceling the stock at the request of Carlisle, and issuing to him stock in lieu thereof, to ascertain that he was the owner of the stock in his possession; and having failed to perform such duty, we think it liable to make good any loss occasioned thereby. Before the Company could lawfully cancel the stock held by Catherwood's estate it was bound to know, not only that an order of sale had been entered by the court, but that a sale had also been made pursuant to the terms of that order. Nugent v. Laduke, 87 Ind. 486; Weyer v. Franklin Second Nat. Bank, supra; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. 10th ed. § 582; Loring v. Salisbury Mills, 125 Mass. 188.

In our opinion, the Superior Court of Marion County at special term erred in overruling the demurrer to the third paragraph of the separate answer of the appellant, the Citizen's Street Railway Company.

The answers of the appellant Johnson present a question entirely different from the one presented by the answer of the Citizen's Street Railway Company.

The certificates of stock owned by the estate of Henry H. Catherwood were canceled by the Company and a new certificate in lieu thereof was issued to John Carlisle in his own name. So far as appears, there was nothing on the face of the new certificate to put anyone on inquiry or to give notice that it was issued in lieu of the Catherwood stock. In this condition Johnson bought it, in the market, without any notice that it had any connection with Catherwood's estate. The question is, therefore, presented as to whether Johnson, under these circumstances, is liable to account to the estate for the stock purchased by him. Could the appellees show that Johnson and those through whom he makes his title had notice of the fact that the Catherwood stock entered into and formed the consideration of the stock purchased by him, doubtless he could follow such consideration and charge Johnson with it. The complaint seems to proceed upon the theory that it was necessary to charge Johnson with such notice; but as notice is denied by the answers, in considering the demurrer thereto, we must treat the case as one in which he purchased in good faith, without notice. We are bound to know that stocks of the kind now under consideration constitute a considerable article of the commerce of the country, and that they are daily bought and sold in the market. To hold that where such stock is thrown upon the market the purchaser must inquire into the antecedents of the same and into the consideration upon which it was issued by the corporation would be to destroy the value of such property as an article of commerce. If the property was offered for sale at a market remote from the office of the Company such inquiry would be practically impossible, and hence the stock in such market would be of no value. We are not inclined to adopt the view that a purchaser of such property is bound to make such examination, unless there is something upon the face of the stock, or something connected with the transaction, to put him on inquiry. Of course, everyone purchasing such stock takes the chances as to whether it is genuine and as to whether the corporation had the legal authority to issue it; but where the stock issued by a corporation having the legal authority to do so is genuine and is regular upon its face, we think a purchaser in good faith, without notice of infirmities which could be ascertained only by an examination of the records of the Company, should be protected. Salisbury Mills v. Townsend, 109 Mass. 115; Machinists Nat. Bank v. Field, 126 Mass. 845; Mount Holly, L. & M. Turnp. Co. v. Ferree, 17 N. J. Eq. 117.

But in this case Johnson did not purchase the certificates of stock owned by Catherwood. Those certificates were canceled by the Citizen's Street Railway Company. The stock purchased by Johnson was evidenced by new certificates issued to John Carlisle by the Company in consideration of the surrender and cancellation of the certificates held by Catherwood at the time of his death. As to whether the Company was authorized to issue the certificates purchased by Johnson, and whether it is valid, are questions between him and the Company, and one into which we need not inquire in this case. But as he did not purchase the stock evidenced by certificates once held by Catherwood and had no notice that such stock ever existed, at the time of his purchase, we think it follows that he is in no way liable to Catherwood's estate.

In the case of Salisbury Mills v. Townsend, supra, it was expressly held that a purchaser of such stock was not bound to examine the books of the corporation or look beyond the certificates assigned to him, in search after the validity of former assignments.

In cases like this, where the old certificates have been surrendered and a new one issued in lieu thereof, the doctrine is that the remedy is against the corporation issuing the new certificate, and that a purchaser of the stock represented by the new certificate in good faith, for value and without notice of any illegality in the surrender and cancellation of the original certificates, will be protected. Pratt v. Taunton Copper Mfg. Co. 123 Mass. 110; Machinists Nat. Bank v. Field, 126 Mass. 845; Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 300, 5 L. R. A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185.

In our opinion the court at special term did not err in overruling the demurrer to the third and fourth paragraphs of the answer of the appellant Johnson.

A question is also made as to the ruling of the court at special term in admitting in evidence a report, made out and sworn to by the administratrix, in which she states that she had sold the stock in question to John Carlisle for cash. The report, so far as the evidence in the cause discloses, was never filed or approved by the court. In this condition it amounts to the mere declaration of the administratrix and constitutes no part of the record in the proceeding to sell the stock. But assuming, without deciding, that it was not proper evidence in the cause, we do not think the appellee, who objected to its introduction, stands in a situation to make such objection. This paper is set out in full in each paragraph of the amended complaint, and is thus made a part of the record in this cause. As it was already a part of the record, and was, as such, before the court, we do not see how the appellee could be injured by allowing the appellants to read it to the court.

term did not err in reversing the judgment of the special term as to the appellant the Citizen's Street Railway Company, but it did err in reversing the judgment as to the appellant Johnson.

The judgment of the Superior Court as to the appellant the Citizen's Street Railway Company is affirmed; and said judgment as to the appellant Tbm. L. Johnson is reversed.

Board of COMMISSIONERS OF GIBSON COUNTY, Appt.

CINCINNATI STEAM HEATING CO.

(...Ind....)

1. A change in a matter of detail such as in the heating of a public building may be made without filing plans and specifications and advertising for proposals, as required by statute in letting the original contract for the building.
2. The presumption is that county officers in making changes in the plan for heating a new public building made only such as were proper.
3. A bond reciting the proposal of a board of commissioners "to advance" the money to the obligor, who binds himself to complete the job of furnishing heating apparatus for a public building in consequence of the default of the principal contractor for the building, is a contract to pay for the work when completed, and not merely to "advance" money.

NOTE.—Building contract; extra work.

The reasonable value of extra work by a contractor is recoverable when done by agreement, but with no price agreed on. Pacific Bridge Co. v. Clackamas County, 45 Fed. Rep. 217.

A provision in a building contract, that no new work shall be considered as extras unless a separate written estimate shall have been signed before it is commenced, may be subsequently waived by the parties by parol. McLeod v. Genius (Neb.) 1 Neb. L. J. 524.

If there has been a deviation from the original plan by consent of parties the contract and estimate are not on that account excluded, and the excess only is to be paid for, according to the usual rates of charging; but if there be a total deviation the workman may charge for the whole work by measure and value, as if no contract had been made. Pepper v. Burland, Peake, 132; Robson v. Godfrey, Hoyt, 236; Ellis v. Hamlen, 3 Taunt. 53.

For all work done beyond the contract, under subsequent or antecedent directions, plaintiff may recover as if no special contract had been made. Thornton v. Place, 1 Mood. & Rob. 219; Fletcher v. Gillespie, 3 King. 667.

But the mere assent to certain alterations is not sufficient to make defendant liable for them as extras not covered by the contract. Lovelock v. King, 1 Mood. & Rob. 60.

If extras have been done without authority defendant is not bound to pay for them. Dobson v. Hudson, 1 Q. B. N. S. 659. See 2 Addison, Cont. § 870.

A contract to heat a building about to be built is performed when the machinery is sufficient for that purpose, as the same was exhibited in plans shown to the contractor. Phoenix Iron Co. v. The Richmond, 11 Cent. Rep. 711, 6 Mackey, 180.

Alteration of building contract generally. See note to Boettler v. Tendick (Tex.) 5 L. R. A. 371.

4. A promise by a beard to pay for heating apparatus for a public building, made to induce the completion thereof by the other party who had already partly furnished it under agreement with the chief contractor for the building, who has made default in payment, is an original, and not a collateral, contract within the Statute of Frauds, at least as to whatever becomes due after the promise is made.

(May 14, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price for certain heating apparatus which had been placed in a county building under an alleged contract with defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. C. Embree for appellant.

Messrs. Fields & Ewing for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th day of September, 1888, the Board of Commissioners of Gibson County entered into a contract with Joseph G. Miller for the erection of a court-house. The plans and specifications were adopted at a meeting of the Board on the 7th day of August, 1888, and notices inviting proposals for building the court-house were published for more than six weeks prior to the time the contract was awarded. The notice was published in a newspaper of general circulation in the County of Gibson. Miller entered upon the work under the contract, and on the 29th day of December, 1884, made a contract with the appellee to furnish a steam-heating apparatus and appliances for the court-house. The plan and specifications agreed upon by Miller and the appellee were different from those adopted in the first instance by the Board of Commissioners, but what the differences were does not appear. The appellee entered upon the work required by its contract, and furnished labor and material. On the 1st day of April, 1885, it received from Miller in part payment $3,000, and on the 20th day of June of that year there was owing from Miller to the appellee the sum of $2,200. This sum Miller failed to pay, although it had been due for more than two months. The architects, McDonald Brothers, refused to issue an estimate, and the appellee tendered to the Board a bond conditioned as follows:

"The condition of this obligation is such, whereas the said Cincinnati Steam Heating Company has a contract with one Joseph G. Miller, who is chief contractor for the erection of a court-house in Gibson County, Indiana, to place certain steam-heating apparatus in said court-house, for which it is to receive the sum of $6,665 in installments equal to eighty-five per cent of the value of the work done and material furnished as said job shall progress, and as there is now due to it the sum of $2,200 on said work on said contract, which said Miller has failed to pay, the said Commissioners having refused to advance any more direct to said Miller on his said contract, but being willing and desirous of advancing to the said the Cincinnati Steam Heating Company direct the money now due, and to become due, for its said work upon the approval of said architects, and propose to advance at once, at next meeting of said commissioners, the $2,200 aforesaid. Now, therefore, if the said, the Cincinnati Steam Heating Company, shall complete its said job of work in accordance with the plans and specifications and terms of its said contract, and the work so completed shall be accepted by the McDonald Brothers, these presents shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

The Board accepted the bond while in session, but made no entry of record. After the acceptance of the bond the Board caused a warrant to issue to the appellee on which it received $2,200. The order directing the warrant to issue reads thus: "Comes now Kenneth McDonald, architect on new court-house, and files estimate for work done and materials furnished for steam heating in the sum of $2,200 by Joseph G. Miller, the estimate having been assigned to the Cincinnati Steam Heating Company, and also showing that Joseph G. Miller, has been previously paid the sum of $80,879, and making a total allowance of $82,879; and after hearing the evidence and being fully advised, it is found that said claim ought to be allowed. It is now ordered that the Cincinnati Steam Heating Company be allowed the sum of $2,200."

The appellee fully performed its part of the contract, and on the 20th day of December, 1885, demanded an estimate, but the architect refused to certify one. On the 1st day of February, 1886, the Board entered an order declaring the court-house completed and ready for occupancy; and, pursuant to such order, possession was taken by the county officers and the record placed in the building. The County, by its officers, occupies the court-house and uses the steam-heating apparatus placed in it by the appellee. On the 14th day of April, 1886, the appellee presented its claim for the remainder due upon its contract, but its claim was rejected. There remains owing the appellee the sum of $1,465.

The appellant's counsel contended that the Board had no authority to contract for the steam-heating apparatus for the reason that no plans and specifications were ever placed on file in the auditor's office, and no notice was published inviting proposals for furnishing the court-house with steam-heating apparatus. This contention is based upon the provisions of the Statute requiring plans and specifications for the construction of public buildings to be prepared and filed before advertising for proposals. Rev. Stat. § 4243.

We cannot accept the views of counsel as correct. In our opinion, the Statute was not intended to prevent changes in plans and specifications from being made in cases where it becomes apparent in the progress of the work that changes are required. We do not mean to be understood as holding that changes in the general plan of the work may be made at the pleasure of the Board of Commissioners; but we do mean to adjudge that changes may be made in details and in minor particulars. If the rigid rule for which the appellant contends were adopted, then the Board could not change a window, a door, a chimney or any like matter, and certainly the Legislature did not mean to establish a rule that would prevent such changes. Of course, no important general change in the plan of the building can be made; but a change in a matter of detail, such as the heating or lighting, may be rightfully made when required. If the Board of Commissioners secures and files plans and specifications so full and specific as to show the character of the proposed building and duly advertises for proposals, the County cannot escape liability without showing that changes in important particulars were made. This conclusion is fairly supported by the case of Bass Foundry & Mach. Works v. Parks County Comrs. 115 Ind. 284.

Neither the County nor its officers can with reason or justice ask that it shall be presumed that the Board of Commissioners either violated the law or acted in bad faith in ordering changes in a matter of detail such as that of heating a court-house; on the contrary, the presumption is that what was done was done rightfully and in good faith. It must therefore be presumed, in the absence of countervailing facts, that the changes respecting the steam-heating apparatus were of such minor importance and so necessary that it was not only the right of the Board to order them made, but that it was its duty to cause them to be made. The County is using and enjoying the property placed in its possession by the appellee in good faith; and the least that it can do if it would keep and enjoy the property without paying for it is to show such facts as make it clearly appear that the acts of its Board of Commissioners were unauthorized or illegal.

It is argued with ability and plausibility that there was no promise on the part of the Board of Commissioners to pay the appellee for the heating apparatus. In our judgment the contention, plausible as it is, cannot prevail. The facts surrounding the parties when the bond was accepted by the Commissioners furnish the light by which the contract must be read. The County was unwilling to pay anything more to Miller, the principal contractor; it had already paid on account of the heating apparatus a considerable sum of money; it was willing to pay the appellee "the sum due and to become due;" the appellee was willing to complete the work and gave bond that it would do so. It can hardly be doubted that the parties meant that one should do the work and that the other should pay for it when it was done. The one did do the work and the other has received the benefit. It must be implied that one should receive compensation, and if this be the implication, then there is an implied promise. It is said, however, that the writing simply expresses a desire to advance money, and does not even express a desire or willingness to pay money; but this certainly is a forced and unnatural construction of the language employed by the parties. It is not reasonable to infer that the Commissioners understood that all that the appellee expected was "a desire to advance money," nor is it reasonable to infer that the appellee agreed to do work for any such consideration. The cases of Harmon v. James, 7 Ind. 263, and Johnston v. Griest, 85 Ind. 503, lend appellant no support, for in those cases no consideration was shown, while here a full and valuable consideration appears. Here, there is a consideration fully expressed; in those cases there was none. The case before us is not ruled by the cases named, but by the principle asserted in Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 98, 4 West. Rep. 235. It is important to mark the fact that not only did the appellee promise the appellant to do the designated work, but that it also gave bond with surety that it would do the work as promised. There was a promise for a promise; there was value previously received, and there was a bond covenanting that what was promised should be performed. No lack of consideration can be justly asserted, for the new bond executed direct to the appellant was itself a consideration, but it was not by any means the only consideration yielded by the appellee. We are satisfied that there was a promise upon a valid consideration moving to the promisor.

We are required to decide whether the promise is within the Statute of Frauds. If it is an original and not a collateral promise, then it is not within the Statute. If it is not an original promise it is within the Statute, for it is well settled that a contract not entirely in writing is verbal and therefore voidable under the Statute requiring collateral contracts to be evidenced by writing. There is here no written promise on the part of the appellant, although there is a verbal assent to a written proposition of the appellee. Higham v. Harris, 108 Ind. 248, 5 West. Rep. 643; Tomlinson v. Briles, 101 Ind. 538; Huckelmon v. Henry County Comrs. 94 Ind. 36; High v. Shelby County Comrs. 93 Ind. 580; McCurdy v. Bowes, 88 Ind. 583-585; Madsen v. County Comrs. 87 Ind. 257; Gordon v. Gordon, 96 Ind. 184; Pule v. Miller, 81 Ind. 190; Marion County Comrs. v. Shipley, 77 Ind. 558.

The promise of the appellant is an original and not a collateral one. The consideration for the promise moved to the appellant, for it obtained a bond securing the performance of the contract and obtained also the materials and labor of the appellee. The benefit accrued to the owner, and not to the original contractor. For what the owner received and retained it was bound in equity and good conscience to pay. Bass Foundry & Mach. Works v. Parks County Comrs. supra.

The appellant did not promise to pay for property received by Miller; its promise was to pay for property received by the County itself. The work was not completed when the promise was made, and Miller was not the debtor for the work that had not been done, however it may be as to the work that had already been performed. But even as to the work that had been done prior to the new promise, Miller was not the ultimate beneficiary from it, for, in the end, the benefit was the County. The new promise secured the completion of the work and this consideration directly and beneficially moved to the appellant. The new bond was an additional consideration, so that there was a complete and valuable new and additional consideration. The consideration yielded secured a new promise and that promise was to do work for the promisor, and work, too, which was for its sole benefit. The appellant made no promise to answer for the debt or default of Miller, nor did it undertake to pay for property delivered to him. What the appellant did promise to do was that it would pay the appellee for work done in improving its property and fitting it for use and occupancy. This new promise was not collateral to any anterior undertaking, for it was not to pay another's debt, nor was it to pay for property delivered to another, or for services rendered for another; on the contrary, the promisor was the sole beneficiary and it was seeking to obtain value for itself and no one else. It seems clear that justice requires that the County should pay what it promised, for its promise was for its own benefit, and all of value that the promise secured accrued directly and completely to it as the owner of the property.

The principle which the well-reasoned cases establish is this: where the owner of property undertakes to pay for work and materials to be subsequently done and furnished by a sub-contractor in order to secure the completion of a building in a case where the principal contractor has failed to carry on the work, the promise is an original one, and not within the Statute of Frauds. This principle is intrinsically just and its enforcement does not in the slightest degree tend to the mischief the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries was intended to repress. In the well-reasoned case of Emerson v. Slater, 63 U. S. 22 How. 26, 16 L. ed. 360, the Supreme Court of the United States gave the subject full consideration, and held that a promise similar to that made by the appellant was enforceable. It was there said: "But whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the Statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability."

It is possible that the language quoted states the doctrine rather too broadly, but we shall not inquire whether it does so or not, for here we are not required to decide what the rule is where the promise relates to the past, inasmuch as we are concerned only with what relates to the future at the time the new promise was made. This is so because the only question in this case is whether the appellee is entitled to recover for work done and material furnished after the new contract was made. If the claim asserted was to the sum owing before the new promise was made, there would, perhaps, be more difficulty in solving the legal problem; but the sum due when the new promise was made was paid, so that the controversy concerns only the right to recover the sum that subsequently became due for work done and materials furnished. We do not decide, we may say by the way, that the sum due might not be recovered under the new promise had it not been paid; we simply decide the question before us, and that relates to matters that at the time the new promise was made concerned the future, and not the past. These were promises in their nature severable and the valid promise may certainly be enforced. Lowman v. Sheets, 124 Ind. 416, 7 L. R. A. 784.

cases bearing directly upon the question before us, we take up that of Sext v. Geise, 80 Ga. 698, where an owner promised to pay for materials furnished to complete a building then in progress of construction, and where it was said: "If the supply of lumber was about to stop, and the owner of the building procured its continuance by promising to pay for it, his undertaking was not collateral, but original, and he is bound."

Another case is that of Kutemeyer v. Ennis, 27 N. J. L. 371, where the court said, speaking of the owner of a building: "He was interested in the completion of the work; he received the benefit of it, and he had it in his power to indemnify himself for the advance to Ennis by withholding the money from the contractors."

In discussing a question which arose in a case very similar to the present, the Supreme Court of Vermont said: "If in this case a third person make an entire substantive and independent contract with him to perform the same service, this may be enforced, though not in writing, as it is not collateral." But without quoting from the decisions or commenting upon them, we cite some of them and affirm that our conclusion that the appellant's contract is original and not collateral is sustained by the overwhelming weight of authority. Yeoman v. Mueller, 35 Mo. App. 848; Crawford v. Edison, 45 Ohio St. 239, 11 West. Rep. 252; Clifford v. Luhring, 69 Ill. 401; Bayles v. Wallace, 56 Hun, 428; Hagadorn v. Stronach Lumber Co. 81 Mich. 56; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Hourin (Tex.) 9 S. W. Rep. 661; Greenough v. Eichholts (Pa.) 15 Atl. Rep. 712; Fitzgerald v. Morrissey, 14 Neb. 198; Young v. French, 35 Wis. 116.

Of the cases cited by the appellant the only ones in point are Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542; Noyes v. Humphreys, 11 Gratt. 686; Ware v. Stephenson, 10 Leigh, 165.

The Virginia cases are out of line with authority, and so is the California case. The latter cites as authority a single case, that of Puckett v. Bates, 4 Ala. 390, and that case is in conflict with the later and better-considered case of Jolley v. Walker, 26 Ala. 690.

Our own cases very clearly recognize the distinction between original and collateral contracts. The earlier cases are collected in Anderson v. Spence, 72 Ind. 815, and it was shown that the case of Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & El. 458, which asserted a doctrine contrary to that here declared had been overruled in England and denied in America.

In Palmer v. Rain, 55 Ind. 11, it was held that a promise by a third person to an execution creditor that if the creditor would satisfy the execution he would pay the judgment was not within the Statute. A very similar decision was made in Frash v. Polk, 67 Ind. 55; in Aughie v. Landis, 95 Ind. 419, it was held that a promise by a defendant to pay for work which the plaintiff agreed to do for a third person was not within the statutory inhibition. The case of Shaffer v. Ryan, 84 Ind. 140, illustrates the difference between an original promise and a collateral one, as does also the case of Hackleman v. Miller, 4 Blackf. 322.

The case before us is not dependent upon the doctrine of novation, so that the cases of Langford v. Freeman, 60 Ind. 48; Krutz v.

Stewart, 54 Ind. 178; Crosby v. Jeroleman, 87 Ind. 264; Ellison v. Wischart, 20 Ind. 82, are not of controlling influence. It is not dependent upon that doctrine for the manifest reason that what was done after the new promise was made was done for the promisor, for its benefit and at its request, and it is only for the value of what was so done that the appellee sues. As to the value of the work and materials furnished under the new promise the contract was one between the appellee and the appellant, and it did not concern any debt due from Miller to the former.

APPPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henry County sustaining a demurrer to a petition claiming money which had been collected as part of the assets of the estate of John Robbins, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. E. Forkner, for appellant.

Messrs. A. L. Nichols and Charles S. Hearn for appellees.

Olds, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John Robbins, late of Henry County, Indiana, died intestate, leaving no widow or children him surviving, but leaving remote heirs. A. R. A. Thompson was appointed administrator of his estate, collected what was due the estate and filed a final settlement report showing a balance of $571.21 in his hands for distribution, concluding his report with the statement: "that the amount shown herein in his hands he pays into court; that the Gammon School of Theology of Atlanta, Georgia, is claiming the money; that he does not know who is entitled to the money or who the heirs are, and he therefore pays the same into court for whoever may be entitled to the money."

Among the assets of the estate was a note dated August 4, 1887, given by one William J. B. Luther to the decedent for $700 borrowed money, due in three years, which note was collected by the administrator and constituted a part of the general funds of the estate of which there remained the balance as stated.

The appellant filed a petition, making the legal heirs parties, alleging facts which it is claimed constituted the appellant the owner of the note for $700, by gift from the decedent during his life, and asked that it be decreed to be the owner of the fund, and that the clerk be ordered to pay the same to it and its board of trustees.

To this petition appellees demurred and the demurrer was sustained and exceptions reserved. The appellant refused to plead further. Final judgment was rendered on demurrer against the appellant, from which judgment it appeals and assigns such ruling as error. The question presented by the demurrer and discussed by counsel is as to whether or not, under the facts alleged, the title to the note, or the proceeds thereof, passed to the appellant by gift from Robbins.

On the 14th day of September, 1887, Robbins executed and delivered to one Rev. James C. Murray, the duly authorized agent of the board of trustees of the plaintiff, a written instrument of which the following is a copy:

State of Indiana, }
Henry County, } ss:

I, John Robbins, of the county and State aforesaid, hereby give to the trustees of the Gammon School of Theology, situated at the City of Atlanta, State of Georgia, organized (or to be organized) under the laws of the said State of Georgia, and under the control and management of the Freeman's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the principal of a note for seven hundred dollars ($700) dated August 4, 1887, due three years after date, and signed by W. J. B. Luther, in trust for the endowment of a perpetual scholarship in said Gammon School of Theology, to be known as the John Robbins Scholarship, said sum of seven hundred dollars to be given in trust to the said trustees when the said note falls due on the 4th day of August, 1890, and to be by them invested according to their best judgment, and the income to be devoted each year to the support of a student in the said Gammon School of Theology under the direction of the faculty of the same.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal this 14th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven.

John X Robbins (Seal)

This writing was attested by two witnesses and acknowledged before a justice of the peace.

The note was retained by Robbins and never was delivered. The question presented is as to whether or not the execution of this writing perfected the gift and transferred the title to the principal of the note without a delivery of the note. The universal rule is that their must be a delivery of the article during the lifetime of the donor to constitute a valid gift inter vivos.

In the case of Smith v. Dorsey, 38 Ind. 451.

367; Beaver v. Beaver (N. Y.) 6 L. R. A. 408; Miller v. McMeichen (W. Va.) 6 L. R. A. 515; Devol v. Dye (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 439

the court said: "To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, it is essential that the article given should be delivered absolutely and unconditionally. The gift must take effect at once and completely, and when it is made perfect and complete by delivery and acceptance, it then becomes irrevocable by the donor. Gifts inter vivos have no reference to the future, but go into immediate and absolute effect. A court of equity will not interfere and give effect to a gift that is inchoate and incomplete."

It is contended that this instrument does make an absolute gift and transfer of the promissory note, and it being declared in writing and the writing being delivered, it operates to pass the title to the property; that a promissory note may be transferred either by an indorsement upon the note or by a separate written instrument. Admitting this to be true in case of a sale and transfer for value of a promissory note, it has no such application in case of a gift. One may make a valid parol contract for the sale of personal property under $50 in value without delivering the property or the payment of any earnest money or reducing it to writing; but to constitute a valid gift inter vivos of personal property, even though it be under $50 in value, the property must be delivered. In case of a gift, the same principle applies whether the property be of great or small value. A party may make a valid sale or gift of a note by delivery without indorsement, so as to transfer the equitable title. If, in this case, Robbins had indorsed the note on the back to the appellant and retained the note, the gift would be incomplete; it would lack the element of delivery to make it valid. One cannot make a valid gift of a horse or a promissory note by saying: "I give the horse or the note to A." It lacks the element of delivery to make it a valid gift.

The well-settled rule is that there must be a delivery of the property with an intention to give. Delivery is absolutely necessary to the validity of a gift. The owner must part with his dominion and control of the article before the gift takes effect. Mere words alone convey no title, and a present gift must be intended; the donor must intend to part with the title and control of the thing at the time of making the gift. A gift to take effect in the future is void. While a delivery is absolutely necessary to the validity of a gift, yet it is not necessary that there should always be a manual delivery of the thing given. It will be sufficient if the delivery be as complete as the thing and the circumstances of the parties will permit. If the article given be too bulky to admit of a manual delivery, but there is a surrender of the possession and control by the donor to the donee, with a clear expression of the intention of the donor to give, and the donee accepts the gift and assumes control of the property, it will be sufficient. In case of a gift of an article of personal property by the father to his child who is at the time a member of his family, the change of possession need only be such as the circumstances and the nature of the property will permit. The same is true of a gift by the husband to the wife. In the case of a gift by the father to his infant daughter residing in his family, on the occasion of her birthday, of a piano, and thereafter it was used by her and claimed as her own and recognized by the father and other members of the family as her property; afterwards she married and having no suitable place to keep the piano at her own home, she allowed it to remain at her father's, she visiting and remaining at her father's for weeks at a time,—it was held that there was such a delivery as passed the title. Ross v. Draper, 55 Vt. 404.

So in the case where the father declared his intention of giving to his infant child certain cattle, and bought a brand and caused it to be recorded and branded the cattle in the name of such child, with the avowed purpose of giving them to the child, and turned them out, it was held that it was a sufficient delivery to pass the title. Hillebrand v. Brewer, 6 Tex. 45.

In these instances the parties made such a delivery of the property as the relations and circumstances of the parties and the nature of the property would permit. The authorities are not uniform as to whether or not, when a present gift of property is expressed in writing and the writing itself is delivered, it is sufficient without the actual delivery of the thing given. It was held that where a father made a gift by a declaration in writing in the form of a deed, to his infant child, of promissory notes, and in the writing itself declared himself a trustee to manage the property for the benefit of the donee, and caused the deed to be recorded, and the donor styling himself trustee, retained the notes, had them assessed to the donee and paid the taxes, and managed them for his said child, that it was a valid gift. Walker v. Crewe, 73 Ala. 412.

We do not think the facts alleged in the complaint in this case bring it within any of the rules above stated by which it constitutes a valid gift. In this case it does not appear that the note drew interest, but the averments in the complaint show it to be a note for $700, due August 4, 1890. The instrument in writing signed by Robbins, when taken as a whole, shows it to be a prospective gift of the money for which the note called. The words in the writing relating to and importing a gift are: "I give to the trustees," etc., the "principal of a note for seven hundred dollars; . . . said sum of seven hundred dollars to be given in trust to the said trustees when the said note falls due on the 4th day of August, 1890, and to be by them invested according to their best judgment." The presumption of law is that the note will be paid when due; and the fair construction to be given to the words used is that it was the intention of the donor to give the money, the principal sum of the note when the note matured to the trustees of the college, and it does not warrant a construction that it was intended by the instrument to assign the principal sum of the note itself to the trustees and authorize them to collect the note; but it is a mere contract to give the money when paid to the trustees, and that they should then invest the money given to them according to their best judgment. While in the fore part of the writing the word "give" is used, yet it is followed by the words "to the trustees of" a school organized, or to be organized. Following later on in the writing it is expressly stated that the sum of $700—not the note for $700, but the sum of $700—is to be given when the note falls due; so that the gift of $700 is to be made, when the note falls due, to the trustees of the college, at the maturity of the note.

The writing itself constitutes a mere agreement to give a sum in the future. There is nothing in the writing indicating an intention to assign the note, or to give to the donees any right to maintain an action for the collection of it. Whatever may be the correct rule as to the effect of a writing whereby a party expresses an intention to make a present gift and transfer the immediate title, custody and control of an article of personal property or chose in action, as a promissory note, when nothing prevents the article or thing given from being actually delivered and handed over from the donor to the donee, as in this case, but no actual delivery being made, can make no difference in this case, for the writing is but an expressed intention or contract to give something in the future; and under such a state of facts the authorities are uniform that no property passes. Zimmerman v. Streeter, 75 Pa. 147; Nickerson v. Nickerson, 28 Md. 327; Shower v. Pilch, 4 Exch. 478; Egerton v. Egerton, 17 N. J. Eq. 419.

In this case, if Robbins had lived, he alone would have had the right to have collected the note, and it required some further act on his part to have passed the title either of the note or the money to the donee. Had he collected and used the money, the writing, having no consideration to support it, could not have been enforced against him; neither can it be against his estate. If not liable upon the contract, there is no liability for the conversion of the money. If the note or the money actually belonged to the donee, then there would be a liability for the conversion of the money; for if the gift was actually executed, then the donor could not revoke it, but it is revokable until executed. Like a promissory note executed by the maker to the payee as a gift, it is but a mere promise to make a gift, and not enforceable. Williams v. Forbes, 114 Ill. 167.

In regard to written declarations of gift, Schouler in his work on Personal Property, § 89, says: "An ordinary writing of gift not under seal would, we presume, have the effect in most States, as in England, of a parol declaration of gift, agreeable to the usual statute provisions, and simply furnish more tangible proof than expressions by mere word of mouth that a gift had been perfected, yet nothing conclusive. Parol declarations of gift, without delivery of the chattel, amount to nothing more at the old law than a promise to give, void for want of consideration; but in some of the later cases written memoranda are found of considerable importance in establishing such a declaration of trust as equity would now be disposed to carry into effect out of regard to the mutual relation of donor and donee."

In 1 Parsons on Contracts, 7th ed. p. 235, it is said: "It is essential to a gift that it goes into effect at once and completely. If it regards the future it is but a promise, and being a promise without consideration, it cannot be enforced, and has no legal validity. Hence delivery is essential to the validity of every gift, for not even a court of equity will interfere to enforce a merely intended or promised gift. There is, it is true, some authority for supposing that a gift inter vivos may be valid without delivery, if there be a distinct acceptance. But this is not the law. Nor will transfer by writing alone satisfy the requirement of delivery." See 2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. pp. 488, 489; Payne v. Powell, 5 Bush, 248; Bishop, Cont. § 82; Green v. Langdon, 28 Mich. 223; Smith v. Dorsey, 38 Ind. 451; Smith v. Ferguson, 90 Ind. 229; Devol v. Dye, 123 Ind. 321, 7 L. R. A. 439.

There was no title to the note or the money collected upon the same passed by the writing to the appellant. The court properly sustained the demurrer to the complaint. There is no error in the record.

APPEAL by defendant Geinger from a judgment of the Superior Court for Orange County in favor of defendant Furstenfeldt in a proceeding instituted to determine which was entitled to money in the hands of complainant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Bulla and George A. Rankin for appellant.

Messrs. V. Montgomery and F. O. Daniel for respondent.

Vanclef, C., filed the following opinion: The plaintiff (clerk of the superior court) brought this action to compel the defendants, Furstenfeldt and Geinger, to interplead as to their respective adverse claims to be paid a sum of money in the possession and custody of the plaintiff, which he was willing and ready to pay to the one to whom the court should determine it was due. The court adjudged that Furstenfeldt was entitled to the money, and Geinger brings this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and contends that, upon the facts found, the judgment should have been in his favor. The material facts found are substantially as follows: (1) In January, 1888, Peter Eschelbach made an assignment of his property to one Lewis, for the benefit of his creditors. (2) Thereafter, Sichler, one of the creditors of the insolvent, brought an action in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County against Lewis, the assignee, to compel him to account to the creditors. (3) In this action against the assignee he was ordered by the court (April 11, 1889) to deposit with the clerk thereof, Dunsmoor (plaintiff herein), about $8,000, to be held pending the litigation as to the proper distribution thereof among the creditors; and thereupon the said sum was so deposited by the assignee. (4) On the same day (April 11, 1889) the court ordered a distribution of said sum among the creditors, one of whom was Antone Miller, to whom the court ordered the clerk (plaintiff herein) to pay from said money the sum of $305.82. (5) On July 8, 1889, Miller assigned all his right and title to the last-mentioned sum, then in the custody of the clerk, to the defendant Furstenfeldt, who, on the following 9th day of July, demanded it of the clerk, but the clerk then refused, and ever since has refused; to pay the same to Furstenfeldt. (6) On the 6th day of April, 1889, the defendant Geinger obtained a judgment in the Superior Court of San Francisco against Antone Miller for the sum of $1,819, upon which execution was issued to the sheriff of Los Angeles County on June 18, 1889, and was duly served by copy and garnishment upon Dunsmoor, the plaintiff, and upon Lewis, the assignee of the insolvent, on June 20, 1889. (7) Dunsmoor, on June 21, 1889, answered to the garnishment notice that he held, subject to the order of the court, $305.82, which had been distributed, by order of the court, in the case of Sichler v. Lewis, to Antone Miller, as above stated. (8) On July 1, 1889, defendant Geinger demanded of Dunsmoor said sum of $305.82, which the latter refused to pay, and which he still holds in his custody, subject to the judgment of the court in this action, as alleged in his complaint herein. (9) Thereafter the defendant Furstenfeldt petitioned the Superior Court of Los Angeles County for an order commanding Dunsmoor to pay to him said sum of $305.82, on the ground that it had been assigned to him by Antone Miller, to whom it had been ordered to be paid in the case of Sichler v. Lewis, Assignee; but the court, after "due hearing," denied his petition "upon the ground that said court had no further control or jurisdiction over said sum of money by reason of the order of distribution previously made by said court." Whether Geinger had notice of this petition is not stated; nor does it appear that he participated in the hearing. It will be seen that the garnishment by virtue of Geinger's execution was thirteen days prior to the assignment by Miller to Furstenfeldt, and, therefore, if the money ($305.82) in the hands of Dunsmoor, or a debt from Dunsmoor to Miller for the same sum of money growing out of the transactions, was subject to the garnishment, the judgment should have been in favor of the appellant; otherwise, the judgment in favor of Furstenfeldt should be affirmed. Section 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "all persons having in their possession or under their control any credits or other personal property belonging to the defendant, or owing any debts to the defendant, at the time of service upon them of a copy of the writ and notice, as provided in the last two sections, shall be . . . liable to the plaintiff for the amount of such credits, property or debts, until the attachment be discharged, or any judgment recovered by him be satisfied." Respondent contends (1) that no part of the money in the possession of Dunsmoor belonged to the defendant Miller; (2) that the money, of which Dunsmoor acquired the possession by the order of the court, was, at the time of the service of the writ, in the custody of the law, and therefore not subject to garnishment; and (8) that Dunsmoor owed no debt to Miller.

$8,000, while in the custody of Dunsmoor, did not belong to the creditors of the insolvent. Lewis, the assignee of the insolvent, held it in trust for those creditors, to be distributed among them ratably in payment of their several demands against the insolvent. In his hands, no one of the creditors could have lawfully claimed any part of the money as his individual personal property; nor could all the creditors jointly have so claimed all the money, as it was not a special deposit by or for them. Wade, Attachm. §§ 329, 407. The transfer of the money from the assignee to Dunsmoor in obedience to the order of the court gave the creditors no more title to it than they had before.

2. Whether the money was ordered to be delivered to Dunsmoor in his official capacity as clerk of the court, or as a receiver or master in chancery, he held it for the same purposes (though not by the same title) for which it had been held by the assignee, and for no other purpose. For such purposes, and until they were accomplished, no doubt the money was in the custody of the law, in the ordinary sense of the term; but, so far as the court was concerned, such purposes were fully accomplished by the final decree in the case of Sichler v. Lewis, Assignee, determining the share of the money to which each creditor was entitled, and ordering Dunsmoor (as clerk or receiver) to pay to each creditor a specific certain sum from the fund. That was the end of the judicial proceedings in the case of Sichler v. Lewis. The execution of the decree by paying the money to the creditors was all that remained to be done. The only reason assigned by the authorities for the rule prohibiting the attachment of property in the custody of the law is that such attachment would generally delay and embarrass judicial and other official proceedings in the administration of such property; and that this is a sufficient reason for the rule, as applied to all judicial proceedings in regard to such property, is generally admitted; and to this extent the weight of authority admits no exception to the rule. But, according to a great preponderance of the modern cases, there are some exceptions to the rule as applied to property in the custody of purely executive officers, based upon the maxim that the rule should not be applied "when the reason of the rule ceases." Civil Code, §§ 8509, 8510. After speaking of the rule and the exceptions thereto in Maryland, Mr. Wade, in his work on Attachment (§ 424) says: "It is elsewhere held, and as it appears, with considerable unanimity, that when defendant has a right to a certain distributive share of the fund in the hands of a receiver, master in chancery or trustee of court, the officer may be effectually garnished by a creditor of the party so entitled, after the court has ordered it to be paid. . . . The authorities seem to concur in holding receivers and similar officers liable to garnishment when they have in their hands a definite sum to which the defendant or judgment debtor is clearly entitled, and the officer has nothing more to do with the fund than to pay it over. Some of them may go beyond, but none, so far as they have been examined, fall short of this conclusion." See also Freem. Executions, § 129; Gaither v. Ballou, 4 Jones, L. 488, 69 Am. Dec. 764.

In speaking of assignees in bankruptcy and insolvency, and after admitting that the property in their hands is not subject to garnishment before an order of distribution, the same author (§ 423) says: "It is another matter when, in the course of the administration of his duties, the assignee has in his hands a sum due one of the creditors, and a creditor of such creditor seeks to charge him as garnishee in respect thereto. In such case the exemption could be maintained, if at all, only on the ground of the official capacity in which the money of the defendant was held. It is no longer the property of the assignee. In case of his refusal to pay it over to the party entitled thereto, the latter should maintain an action for it. It is not apparent how, in such case, the assignee would occupy ground more favorable to his exemption than would a sheriff in possession of a surplus due an execution defendant." As to sheriffs, see section 421, same author. In cases of garnishment of executors and administrators in respect to the property of legatees and heirs the exception to the rule of exemption applies after an order of distribution of the property has been made whereby the share or portion of the defendant in attachment is rendered definite and certain. Wade, Attachm. §§ 425, 426; Freem. Executions, § 181; Estate of Norac, 85 Cal. 892.

I think the case at bar comes fairly within the exception to the rule that property in the custody of the law is not subject to garnishment.

3. Having conceded that no part of the money in the hands of Dunsmoor—that is, no particular coins or bank-bills—could be said to be the personal property of Miller, a delivery of which to himself he was entitled to demand of Dunsmoor, it remains to answer the objection that "Dunsmoor owed no debt to Miller." If, as contended and conceded, no particular money in Dunsmoor's hands belonged to Miller, and Dunsmoor might have paid Miller the sum ordered by the court to be paid him in any lawful money, it would seem to follow that Dunsmoor owed Miller $305.82; and, surely, what Dunsmoor owed Miller was a debt (Rodman v. Munson, 13 Barb. 197), the payment of which Miller could have enforced. Indeed, it was a debt in the strict legal sense, —a judgment—a debt of record. Burrill, Law Dict. For a full exposition of the word "debt," as used in law, and particularly in statutes, see New Jersey Ins. Co. v. Meeker, 87 N. J. L. 300, and authorities there cited. Any kind of obligation of one man to pay money to another is a debt. "A debt signifies what one owes. There is always some obligation that it shall be paid; but the manner in which . . . it is to be paid, or the means of coercing payment, do not enter into the definition." Rodman v. Munson, supra.

Perhaps Miller might have coerced payment by motion in the same court that ordered the payment. If not, he certainly could have recovered the debt by action upon the judgment rendered in the case of Sichler v. Lewis.

I think the judgment should be reversed, and that the lower court should be directed to render judgment on the findings of fact in favor of appellant.

We concur: Foote, a., Temple, a.

A purchase of stock by a broker for his customer, who puts up a margin and, aside from commissions and interests, simply receives or pays the difference between the buying and selling values, is invalid under Const., art. 4, § 26, as a sale of stock on margin, and can give the broker no remedy to enforce the customer's indebtedness to him thereon.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel a reconveyance to plaintiff of certain real estate which he had conveyed to defendant Hooker as security for margins which might be demanded by defendant Root in connection with stock transactions which he was carrying on for plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. P. Reddy and W. H. Metson, for appellant:

All of the alleged accounts and dealings between the defendant Hooker and appellant were void, for the reason that the same were founded upon and were contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of corporations on margin.

Const. art. 4, § 26.

The language used by the parties shows an express contract to buy and sell shares of the capital stock of corporations "on margin."

Civil Code, § 1620.

The court must virtually have stricken from the contract the words "on margin" in order to have found, as it did, which, in effect, made a new contract for the parties in the face of the language of the contract, and the expressed intention of the parties, which is contrary to all rules of interpretation and construction.

Jones, Commercial and Trade Contracts, § 8.

Defendant Hooker, being at the time of the making of the contract, a member of the San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board of Brokers, and the plaintiff having been engaged for years before that time in buying and selling stocks on margin in that market, both of the parties should be presumed to have understood the term "on margin," and to have used it with the trade meaning.

In the Constitutional Convention "sale on margin," was defined as follows: "It is merely a sale of stock on time, the stock being retained as security, and not delivered until final payment is made. That is what is generally called a sale on margin. If the stock falls in value before the time of final payment arrives, the buyer is called upon to advance more margin."

Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, vol. 2, p. 806.

Contracts for sales on margin, as above defined, are the contracts declared to be void by the provisions of the Constitution above referred to.

It is no part of the broker's function to receive the property bought or sold by him, still less to pay the price, or to take the delivery, in his own name.

Messrs. Pillsbury & Blanding for respondent Root.

Messrs. M. C. Baum and Charles J. Heggerty for respondent Hooker.

Temple, O., filed the following opinion:

This action is brought to compel a conveyance to plaintiff of certain real estate, which it is averred was conveyed by plaintiff to defendant Root on the 18th of June, 1884, in trust to secure the payment by plaintiff to defendant Hooker of any indebtedness which might exist within six months after the 14th of July, 1885. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was not, at the commencement of the suit, and for a long time prior had not been, indebted to Hooker in any amount whatever. Demand for a deed and refusal are also averred. The answers admit that the conveyance was made in trust, as charged in the complaint, but charge that plaintiff is still indebted to the defendant Hooker in the sum of $2,847. Defendant Hooker was a stock broker engaged in buying and selling mining stocks in San Francisco, on margin or otherwise, as required. Plaintiff had been a regular customer of Hooker for many years, and had lost heavily in stock speculations. Being, as Hooker testified, rather short of money, he conveyed the property sued for in trust to defendant Root, who was in Hooker's employ, to cover margins, and to enable plaintiff to continue his speculations in stock. Hooker states that he valued it at about $3,000, and to that extent plaintiff could buy on margin without actually putting up money. They continued to deal together until Hooker's business was closed by his insolvency in December, 1886, at which time Hooker held certain stocks for plaintiff, and, according to Hooker's books, plaintiff owed him $2,847. Plaintiff does not dispute the correctness of the account according to the course of dealing between the parties or their understanding at the time, but claims that the debt is illegal, and the contract to pay void, under section 26 of article 4 of the Constitution of this State. It reads as follows: "All contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association, on margin or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered by the party paying it by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." Plaintiff's dealings with Hooker were altogether on margin. When the estimated value of the land did not afford sufficient margin, it was put up in cash, and was kept good as the market fluctuated. Upon purchasing stock, the cost price was charged to plaintiff, less the amount of margin put up in cash. When sold, his account was credited with the amount realized. He was, of course, charged with the broker's commissions and the interest on the money advanced. The result, of course, was that plaintiff, aside from the commissions and interest, simply received or paid the differences between the buying and selling values. It was not contemplated that he should ever receive the stock, although he might, had he been able, have paid his debt and demanded the securities at any time. Stock ordered was always purchased by Hooker, paid for in full, and delivered to him, except when he had orders to sell the same stock for another customer, in which case the stock was simply transferred from one account to the other at market rates. The account was generally balanced monthly, when, as Hooker testified, plaintiff could tell whether he had lost or won in stocks. Hooker did not keep the stock of his customers separate, or preserve its identity, but always had under his control sufficient to satisfy the claims of his customers.

It is evident from these facts that the only purpose of these dealings was to enable plaintiff to speculate in the fluctuations of the market. If there were no break in the proceedings, it was indifferent to plaintiff whether any stock was bought or not, provided the entries were made in his account according to the market rates. It was quite a different matter, however, to Hooker. Had he not purchased, the transaction would have been a continuous wager between himself and his customer as to the future of the market. By purchasing he secured himself, and had no other interest than his commissions and the interest on his money. So, too, had there been a break anywhere in the deal, it might have been important to determine whether the stock was purchased by Hooker as agent and belonged to plaintiff, or was purchased for himself simply to make himself safe upon his contract to give plaintiff the advantage of the fluctuations of the market. The respondent contends that the relation of vendor and vendee did not exist between plaintiff and Hooker; that they neither bought nor sold stock to each other; that Hooker, as agent for plaintiff, purchased and paid for the stock, receiving immediate delivery for plaintiff, and thereafter held it subject to his order upon the payment of the price and commissions. The further contract, by which he held it as security for a loan, constituted the relation of pledgee and pledgor, which is not prohibited by the Constitution. This view was adopted by the learned judge of the trial court, and the findings are carefully drawn upon that theory. They find that the stock was purchased by Hooker as agent of and belonged to plaintiff, and that Hooker never sold stock to or bought from, plaintiff. No part of the indebtedness, therefore, arose from the sale of stock on margin or otherwise.

This view of the relation between the broker and his customer in such a transaction is sustained by the weight of authorities, in this country and in England, but the decisions are by no means uniform. The first prominent case on the point is Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 285. The question there was whether the stock in the hands of the broker was a pledge. In order to determine this question, an analysis is made of the contract relations, separating the powers and obligations of the parties. It was held that the broker undertook (1) to purchase for his customer; (2) to advance the money required beyond the margin; (3) to carry the stock, the margin being kept good, the customer to receive the gain or suffer the loss; (4) to retain the stock, or an equal amount of the same kind of stock; (5) to deliver to customer when required, upon payment; or (6) to sell when required, accounting for the proceeds. That the customer contracts: (1) to pay the stipulated margin; (2) to keep the margin good; and (3) to take the shares when required, and pay the amount due the broker.

This statement of the rights and obligations of the parties has been generally followed in other cases, in which similar questions have arisen; and stockboards and brokers have adopted it as correctly stating the nature of the relation between broker and customer. It is evident, however, that the court in this analysis assumes the conclusion which it desired to reach. Its correctness has been questioned. In that case there were two strong dissenting opinions, in which the relation between the broker and his customer was regarded simply as a contract relation, by which the fact of agency was ignored or denied. Mr. Justice Grover says: "The contract contemplated that the title should at all times remain in the defendants (brokers)." Mr. Justice Woodruff refers for his views of the relation to his opinion in Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Pr. 866. He there states his opinion to be that "it does not contemplate, in the first instance, that the customer shall ever acquire the title to the stock. It is a pure speculation in the rise and fall of stocks, . . . and the broker is employed to provide the means, either from his own funds, . . . or by borrowing in his own name and on his own credit, by pledge of the very stock which he buys, the required amount; and the whole expectation and intention of the parties is satisfied, if, when directed to sell, he produces the required number of shares, and sells them for the very purpose for which the speculation is made, viz.: to realize the profits or determine the loss which results to the party employing him for that purpose. It is entirely clear that in these transactions the party employed, though he belongs to a class commonly called 'brokers,' does not act as broker merely. In such business they are more than brokers; and all arguments imputing to them a mere agency, so far as they rest upon the facts that they are called 'brokers,' are unsound and fallacious." In Pennsylvania it has been held that the relation of principal and agent does not exist between the broker and his customer, but both are principals. Buchizky v. De Haven, 97 Pa. 202; North v. Philips, 89 Pa. 250; Dickson v. Thomas, 97 Pa. 278; Gheen v. Johnson, 90 Pa. 88.

In Ingraham v. Taylor, 58 Conn. 508, it was held that the broker, under such a contract, was not bound to purchase the stocks at all. It was enough if he could procure them when called for, at the market rate, when ordered. It is said: "By such contracts the plaintiff bought the right to demand at his option as to the time the delivery of shares at the price of the day of agreement. The defendants, in consideration of his payments upon margins, assumed the risk of an undertaking to deliver shares upon demand at that price." These citations are made to show that it is not universally admitted that the broker in such transactions purchases the stock as the agent of the customer. Looking at it from the point of view of the customer only, it is clear that by this device he has been able to purchase stock on margin. This phrase has come to have a peculiar or technical meaning among stock dealers, and it is applied to just these transactions between broker and customer.

It is a matter of public history that the constitutional provision was adopted just after a period of remarkable stock speculation, in which a large part of the community had been set wild with the apparent prospect of great gain, and the rapid fluctuations of stock afforded unusual inducement to stock gambling. By skillful manipulation of the markets, a few fortunate ones had been able to take advantage of the existing mania, and make large fortunes for themselves, at the cost of wide-spread financial ruin and distress. People of small means were enabled by brokers to speculate largely at that time, through these very purchasers on margin. Of these matters this court will take judicial notice, and, doing so, cannot doubt that this inhibition was intended to strike down this practice. If it does not do this, it simply beats the air. Although an isolated case or two might occur, where a transaction directly between vendor and vendee is upon like terms, certainly we know there was no practice of that kind which could have been regarded as an evil of sufficient importance to be prohibited in the fundamental law. Such a prohibition is of little worth if it can be evaded by so simple a device. A party wishing to purchase on margins has but to interpose his broker, who is to carry the stock instead of the original owner. This would not diminish the evil. In fact, it is the very form of the evil mainly intended to be prohibited. It may be said that if the relation be not one of principal and agent, but simply a contract relation, by which the broker agrees to speculate in stocks, the customer indemnifying him against loss, and taking the profits, still there is no sale. It would be, it may be said, a contract to enable the customer to speculate in differences of market values. It is only sales on margin that are prohibited and made void. It is not easy to characterize by a name the relation between the broker and his customer. For all ordinary purposes, it may be admitted that the broker purchases as the agent of his customer, and then holds the stock as a pledge to secure a debt; but if by the transaction the customer is enabled to do that which is prohibited, to wit, purchase stock on margin, it must be held to be within the prohibition; and if Hooker did not himself sell to plaintiff, but was only the instrument through whom the illegal end was accomplished, he being privy to the design, the same result would follow. Irvine v. Williar, 110 U. S. 510, 28 L. ed. 280. In the accomplishment of the unlawful purpose, he took the place of the vendor, and carried the stock as the vendor might have done; and the end was thus reached per interpositam personam. The end attained, and not the form of the transaction, must determine the question. It is claimed that it does not appear that the stock was the capital stock of a corporation or an association; but it is so found, and the respondent is in no position to complain of the finding. We think the court erred in holding, from the evidence, that plaintiff was indebted to Hooker or his assignee. We therefore recommend that the order and judgment be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: Foots, C.; Fitzgerald, C.

Husband and wife as tenants by entirety.

Where land is given by will to husband and wife, they hold by entireties, and the right of survivorship will prevail over any attempted alienation by the husband. Simonton v. Cornelius, 26 N. C. 433, 3 Bl. Com. 183.

Both are seised of the entirety per tout, et non per my, so that neither can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor. Litt. § 635; *Co. Right of husband to control estate.

The right at common law to control the possession during the joint lives of husband and wife is in the husband, yet neither can defeat the right of the prejudice of the rights of complainants in the present bill. Hearing the cause on pleadings and proof, the chancellor adjudged that complainants were entitled to the relief sought in their bill, and that Mrs. Shelton had no right of homestead in the property involved. From that part of the decree refusing her claim to homestead she has appealed to this court. The conveyance of the residence by husband and wife, to secure payment of particular debts, is not a waiver of the right of homestead therein, as against other debts. Hall v. Fulgham, 86 Tenn. 451. If the secured debts be not paid, and the deed of trust or mortgage be foreclosed, the surplus proceeds of the property is subject to the homestead right, and will be held as an exempt fund, to the extent of $1,000, for reinvestment in other real estate. White v. Fulghum, 87 Tenn. 281. So that in the case before us there is nothing to defeat the claim of Mrs. Shelton in the fact that she and her husband conveyed this property in trust to secure Stegall's debts, and that foreclosure has been decreed. As against complainants, her right is the same as it would be without such conveyance and decree. If in that case she would be entitled to homestead in the property, she is now entitled to the same right in such of its proceeds as may remain after payment of the secured indebtedness. The homestead is in the head of the family, and, in case of marriage, in the husband primarily; but when the wife obtains a divorce from her husband, on account of his fault or misconduct, "the title to the homestead shall be vested, by decree of the court granting the divorce, in the wife, and after her death it shall pass to the children." Mill. & V. Code, § 2946. This provision of the Statute was met by the judgment of the circuit court when granting Mrs. Shelton a divorce, and the homestead was thereby effectually vested in her, if in law the property was subject to the right of homestead at all. The reservation in that judgment did not diminish her legal rights thereunder, for complainants in this cause had taken no steps, nor indeed could they have taken any, which could operate to the prejudice of any existing right of homestead. It follows, therefore, that Mrs. Shelton is now entitled to the right of homestead in said house and lot, or its proceeds when sold, subject alone to the prior claim of Stegall, if said property was held by such a title as to be subject to the claim of homestead by G. W. Shelton before the execution of the deed of trust. In short, the question is whether or not the right of homestead exists or inheres in real estate owned by husband and wife jointly as tenants by entireties. The learned chancellor was of opinion that it did not, and so adjudged. By the Statute, "a homestead or real estate in the possession of or belonging to each head of a family, and the improvements, if any, thereon, to the value of, in all, $1,000, shall be exempt from sale under legal process during the life of such head of a family, and which shall inure to the benefit of his widow and children, and shall be exempt from sale in any way, at the instance of any creditor or creditors." Mill. & V. Code, § 2935. "Each head of a family owning real estate shall have the right to elect where the homestead or said exemption shall be set apart, whether living on the same or not." Id. § 2936. These provisions "apply as well to equitable as legal estates," and also "to leasehold property." Id. §§ 2937, 2938. And homestead exists in favor of one owning only a life estate in the land. Arnold v. Jones, 9 Lea, 548. The homestead exemption is a favorite in this country, and laws concerning it are construed liberally in favor of the claimant. Thompson, Homestead and Exemptions, §§ 4, 7, 781; 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 519; White v. Fulghum, 87 Tenn. 284; Dickinson v. Mayer, 11 Helsk. 520; Arnold v. Jones, 9 Lea, 548; Ren v. Driskell, 11 Lea, 649.

The language of our Statute is most comprehensive. In the description of the property in which the right exists, its terms are broad and survivor to the whole estate. The husband has such rights as are incident to his own property. Pray v. Stebbins, 1 New Eng. Rep. 521, 141 Mass. 223.

The right of the husband to control the estate held by entireties is not affected by statutes enabling married women to hold and dispose of their property as if sole unless expressly so stated. Ibid., citing *Robinson v. #### Lease by husband.

By the great weight of authority the husband may lease an estate conveyed to him and his wife in fee, which will be good against the wife during coverture, and will fail only in the event of his wife surviving him. Washburn v. Burns, 34 N. J. L. 18; Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 615; Jackson v. McConnell, 19 Wend. 175; Bertles v. Nunan, 63 N. Y. 152; Topping v. Sadler, 5 Jones, L. 357; *Fairchild v. #### Husband cannot convey to prejudice of wife's estate.

The estate of the wife as survivor of her husband is not affected by conveyance by the husband, during coverture, of the whole estate (Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 683), nor by a levy upon the estate by creditors of the husband. French v. Mehan, 56 Pa. 286.

But he can convey directly to his wife such title as he has in real estate which they own as tenants by entireties. Enyeart v. Kepler, 118 Ind. 84.

Conveyances to husband and wife and third person; tenancy created.

Where an estate is made to a husband and wife and a third person, unless a tenancy in common has been created, they together take one half by entirety and the third person the other half to be held in common. Hulett v. Inlow, 87 Ind. 412; Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670.

It is always competent, however, by appropriate words, to make the husband and wife tenants in common. The laws of the several States are not uniform on this subject. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 426; 4 Kent, Com. 362; Anderson, Dict. 404, citing Chandler v. Cheney, 87 Ind. 294; Re Benson, 8 Biss. 118; Jacobs v. Miller, 80 Mich. 124; Hadlock v. Gray, 2 West. unrestricted: "A homestead or real estate in the possession of or belonging to each head of a family . . . shall be exempt, etc.; and "each head of a family owning real estate shall have the right to elect," etc. Interpreting these words according to their ordinary significance, as must be done in the absence of any qualification or limitation upon them, there can be but little trouble in ascertaining the legislative intent. Undenially the designation "real estate," in its ordinary sense includes the interest of a husband in a house and lot owned by himself and his wife jointly as tenants by entireties. If such an interest is not, in fact and in law, real estate, what can it be? Certainly it is not personalty. So naturally does it fall within the meaning of the words "real estate," as employed in the Statute, that they must inevitably be held to embrace it, there being nothing in other parts of the Act, or in its history, indicating, even remotely, that the lawmakers used those words unadvisedly, or intended to omit or exclude such an interest from the protection of the Statute.

Moreover, the object of the Statute, as well as its language, demands this construction. It was conceived that an Exemption Law, protecting $1,000 worth of real estate to heads of families owning the same, would be wise legislation, and promotive of the public welfare. To be so, it must be impartial, and apply alike to each head of a family owning "a homestead or real estate," whether in fee, for life, leasehold interest, legal or equitable estate. The nature of the estate or extent of the title of the beneficiary was not of the essence of the scheme. The purpose was to stay the hand of the creditor, as against a limited amount in value of real estate, of whatever character, belonging to any citizen who should be the head of a family. It was known, unquestionably, that different persons, entitled to the same protection, owned different interests and different estates in land, and terms broad enough to include them all were employed. Why not include the head of a family who owns land as tenant by entirety with his wife in the scope of a law whose purpose is so humane and commendable? To the extent of his interest, he can use the land for the shelter, support and benefit of his family, in the same manner as could another man owning the absolute fee. He stands in the same or greater need of the law's favor. Is he any the less deserving of protection because he does not own the whole estate? Or is the officer of the law to take what he has because he has not more? Manifestly not. The protection of such an interest is clearly within the spirit and the letter of the Statute. We can conceive no satisfactory reason why the Legislature should not have intended to embrace in this wholesome provision all present interests in land naturally embraced in the language used in the Act. Again, under the authority of Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 682, the estate of G. W. Shelton in the house and lot in question here might, before the deed of trust, have been seized and sold at law, and the purchaser at such a sale would have become vested with the "right to occupy and enjoy the rents and profits of the land during the joint lives" of Shelton and wife, and, in case Shelton survived her, with 12 L. R. A.

the fee. Now, can it be that an interest in land which is so subject to seizure and sale, and the sale of which will vest in the purchaser the right to the full enjoyment of the whole property during the life of the debtor at least, is not real estate, within the contemplation of the Homestead Law? We think not. If the creditor, in right of the husband, may take the whole property, at all events during the life of the latter, so the husband, in his own right, may invoke the protection of the law for the whole property during the same period. The husband's estate under the deed, augmented by his marital interest in his wife's estate, becomes practically tantamount to the whole estate during their joint lives. It is so held in favor of his creditors seeking a sale, or in favor of purchasers at judicial sale; for like reason it must be so held in his favor when he asserts his claim for homestead. That property held by husband and wife by entireties could not "inure to the benefit of his widow and children" upon his death, but would vest in her absolutely by right of survivorship, is not a sufficient reason for denying his right of homestead therein while they both live. If so, then the right of homestead could never exist in favor of a life tenant, for his estate ceases with his death, and nothing can "inure to the benefit of his widow and children" as homestead. But the right of homestead does exist in a life estate (Arnold v. Jones, 9 Lea, 548) and in "leasehold property" (Code, § 2988), though the period of the lease may terminate in the lifetime or at the death of the lessee. The meaning of the Statute is that, in lands descending from the husband and father, the homestead "shall inure to the benefit of the widow and children." We cannot believe, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, in the face of the law itself, that the framers of our Constitution, and the members of the General Assembly, intended to extend the benefits of the homestead exemption to citizens owning real estate in severalty, and not to those owning it jointly with their wives, as tenants by the entirety. A law making such a distinction would, in our judgment, be both impolitic and unjust. It would be an unjustifiable discrimination in favor of some persons and against others alike deserving of the law's favor and protection. Such is not our law, which, as we understand it, is distinctly impartial, extending the right of the exemption to "each head of a family owning real estate," whether in fee, for life, for years, in severalty, in joint tenancy, etc.

The case of McRoberts v. Copeland, 85 Tenn. 211, is not in point. There a husband and father conveyed a tract of land to his daughters, reserving a life estate to himself and his wife. The court held that after his death his wife took the life estate by survivorship in her own right, and that it should not be "reckoned as a part of his land in the assignment of homestead and dower" to her as his widow, because "all his title and interest in that particular tract of land ceased absolutely with his death." 85 Tenn. 212, 218. The husband's right of homestead exemption in the reserved life estate was in no sense involved, and could not have been, under the facts of that case, it arising after all his interest had passed away.

Had he made the claim of such right in his lifetime, it should have prevailed; but how that would have been the court was not called upon to express an opinion, and could not properly have done so. As to the case of Avans v. Everett, 3 Lea, 76, wherein it was decided that the right of homestead did not exist in land held by tenants in common, we content ourselves with the observation that its reasoning (which we do not feel called upon to approve) has no application to this case, because here the debtor's interest is practically equivalent to an estate for life, at the least, in severalty, and is not an undivided interest merely, as in that case; that if sound upon its own facts, which we do not decide, the doctrine of that case should not be extended. In Mary O. Oulom v. John A. Cooper et al., decided at the December Term, 1888 (oral opinion), the question was exactly the same as that involved in the present case, and the decision was against the claim of homestead. With the greatest care we have reconsidered the question, and now decide it otherwise, holding that the right of the homestead exemption does attach to real estate owned by husband and wife jointly as tenants by entireties. For reasons already stated, it is clear that G. W. Shelton was entitled to homestead in the house and lot, subject alone to the deed of trust. The judgment of the circuit court granting Mrs. Shelton a divorce vested her with the same right. She is now entitled to an exemption in the surplus proceeds of the property, the same to be reinvested according to law. White v. Fulghum, 87 Tenn. 290.

Reverse the decrees as to homestead, and enter decree in accordance with this opinion. Complainants will pay costs of appeal.

Snodgrass, J., dissenting:

We do not concur in the holding that the homestead exemption applies to the interest of a husband in land held in joint tenancy with the wife. He is not the owner of the property, or sole possessor, as contemplated by our law. Under the Constitution, "a homestead in the possession of each head of a family, and the improvements thereon to the value, in all, of $1,000, shall be exempt from sale under legal process during the life of such head of a family, to inure to the benefit of the widow, and shall be exempt during the minority of their children occupying the same." Const. 1870, art. 11, § 11. The Statute of 1870 on this subject is in exactly the same terms, exempting "a homestead in the possession of each head of a family." It also provided that such homestead should inure to the benefit of the widow, and be exempt during the minority of the children occupying it, and until the youngest child reached the age of twenty-one years. The 6th section of the Act provided that "the homestead in the possession of a husband shall, upon his death, go to his widow during her natural life, with the products thereof for her own use and benefit, and that of her family who reside with her, and upon her death it shall go to the minor children of her deceased husband, free from the debts of the father, mother or said children; and upon the death of said minor child or children, or their arrival of age, the same may be sold, and the proceeds distributed among all the heirs-at-law of the deceased head of a family, according to the Laws of Descent and Distribution in this State." The 7th and 8th sections are as follows: "Sec. 7. Upon the death of said head of a family without widow or minor children, said land shall be sold for the payment of the debts as may be legally established against his estate, and the remainder distributed among his heirs according to the rules of descent in force at the time in this State. Sec. 8. If the head of a family is married, and his wife obtain a divorce on account of his fault or misconduct, the title to the homestead shall be vested by the decree of the court granting the divorce in the wife, and after her death it shall pass to their children."

These sections quoted show conclusively that the homestead contemplated was to exist on land owned by the head of a family; that it was such as might inure to the benefit of his widow (because she was such) after his death, and which would descend to his children, or, when sold, the proceeds might be distributed "among all the heirs at law of the deceased head of a family," "among his heirs." It was an estate too, which, after the death of wife or children, might be sold "to pay debts legally established against his estate," and was such a one that, if the wife obtained a divorce on account of his fault or misconduct, it was to be vested by decree of court in the wife for life, and after her death in "their children."

These provisions show, first, that the land subject to homestead must belong to the husband in severalty, and especially that they do not apply to lands held by husband and wife in joint tenancy. Such land goes to the survivor on the death of either. Taul v. Campbell, 7 Yerg. 319; Berrigan v. Fleming, 2 Lea, 271; Shields v. Netherland, 5 Lea, 201; McRoberts v. Copeland, 85 Tenn. 211. It is manifest, then, that a homestead on it would not inure to the benefit of his widow as such, and for her use and benefit, and that of her family residing with her, and upon her death to the minor children of her deceased husband, because on his death the entire fee would vest in her, and "her family residing with her" could take no interest in it whatever, nor upon her death would it go to the minor children of her deceased husband. It would go to her devisee, or, in default of a will, to her children or heirs, and not to his, unless, of course, they were the same. And, for the same reason, it could not be sold and proceeds distributed among his heirs in the contingencies provided for as quoted; nor, upon divorce granted for his misconduct, could it be vested in the wife for life, with remainder to their children, because that would be to limit her own fee for life, and deprive her of the power to devise her estate after coverture. If, upon dissolution of the marital relation, the property would vest in her, it would be absolutely. These considerations, it seems to us, show conclusively that the Homestead Law is not applicable to such a tenancy; but there are others. If a legal homestead does exist on such an estate, what is the effect of it? Suppose a divorce granted to the husband. He would still remain the head of the family, and the homestead right would exist in him. Then it must continue to the destruction of the wife's interest in the fee for life; so that in that event a homestead would be carved out exclusively for him in land which did not belong to him, but which in fact belonged also to another. So, too, the husband can abandon a legal homestead, and the fee in it may be sold in that event for his debts, and it will vest in the purchaser free from the homestead right; but it cannot be said that such sale would affect the wife's right in a joint tenancy, even if she joined in the abandonment, because her interest in the fee, her right of survivorship, would not be affected by either abandonment or sale. The Act of 1879, amending the Homestead Law of 1870, does not affect the question by adding to the words "a homestead" the words "or real estate belonging to each head of a family," because these words made no other change in the law than to give the husband or head of the family the right to elect where he would locate the homestead. Flatt v. Stadler, 16 Lea, 379. Now, suppose the husband elects to locate it on the joint tenancy of himself and wife, and dies leaving other lands. The wife, according to the case being considered, would take the selected homestead as such (although it was her own), and would thereby be cut out of any homestead in the husband's land. This would inevitably result if such an interest was a proper homestead, but we have held it was not, and defeated this very result in her favor. McRoberts v. Copeland, 85 Tenn. 211.

There are many considerations of like character which go to prove that such a joint estate in land was not within the contemplation of the law-makers in establishing "a homestead in possession of the head of a family;" and there is still a part of the Statute unquoted which we think clearly shows that neither such an estate, nor any other estate held in common with others, was within such contemplation; and that only such was exclusively within the ownership and possession of the head of a family was contemplated,—such as he held in severalty, and could be set apart to him by metes and bounds, and that without resorting to a court to partition and carve out for him such estate. The third and fourth sections of the Act provide for levy upon the real estate of the debtor upon which the homestead is situated by execution and attachment, and directs that the levying officer shall summon three disinterested freeholders, and have them set apart the homestead of the debtor out of the real estate levied upon. They are to fix the precise boundaries, and the remainder of the lands are to be sold. If it is of greater value than $1,000, and is so situated that it cannot be divided so as to set apart the homestead, the freeholders shall certify the fact, and the officer shall sell the whole, and pay proceeds to the clerk of the court rendering judgment or condemning the land for sale; and he shall, under order of the court, invest $1,000 in the purchase of a homestead for the family of the debtor, and the creditor take the surplus. Now, it is clear that this cannot apply to an interest held jointly with the wife any more than with anyone else; because, if it does so apply, it forces the sale of her land, and makes her take in lieu of all of it, and all interest in it, her family share in the part allotted as homestead, or in that purchased for the benefit of the family,—this upon the theory that such is the effect that results under the law, and must result if this land is within its meaning. That these consequences could follow no one can maintain, and thus it appears that such an estate was never within the intent of the Act. There are more reasons why such an estate could not be burdened with a homestead, by proper construction of our Act, than there are why a tenancy in common could not. The tenancy in common, while, like this, a legal estate, has no termination in survivorship, but will descend to heirs, and may inure to the benefit of a widow, not because of her own, but because of her husband's interest; and yet the reason of a want of an interest and possession in severalty, which prevents a tenancy in common being so burdened, exists here, and equally precludes the possibility of the existence of a homestead upon a joint tenancy, and to this extent authority against homestead on a tenancy in common is authority against a homestead here. It was ten years ago decided that no such right existed in favor of a tenant in common. Avans v. Everett, 8 Lea, 76. And this has ever since been followed. But the direct question came before us at Knoxville, September Term, 1886, and it was then held such an interest as the wife's on survivorship could not be taken into consideration in fixing homestead, but the wife owned such land, and homestead must be assigned out of other lands of the husband. McRoberts v. Copeland, 85 Tenn. 211 (opinion by Judge Caldwell). It came again before this court at Nashville, last term, and we there held that the Homestead Law did not apply to a joint tenancy of husband and wife. Culdom v. Cooper (oral opinion). These cases settled the law in accord with the case referred to, and many others unreported. They are sound in reason, and should be adhered to as the only proper construction of the Statute. It does not matter that one was an oral opinion. It was in accord with the written one cited, and, besides, this court, of course, adheres to principles settled, however it may be done, and does not have one law to administer orally and another in writing. The one delivered in this case was oral, but since adjournment at Jackson a written opinion has been prepared. In this opinion, not only is the case in 85 Tenn. referred to, impliedly overruled, but the case of Avans v. Everett, 8 Lea, 76, would share the same fate, if the reasoning of Judge Caldwell in this case should be adhered to when the question arises, for it is based upon authority hostile to it, and which was referred to and rejected by Judge Cooper, who delivered the opinion of the court in Avans v. Everett. We regard the overruling of 85 Tenn. and the oral opinion at Nashville, as not only erroneous, but unwise in policy. We therefore respectfully, but earnestly, dissent from the present ruling.

Lurton, J., concurs in this dissent.

J. I. CASE THRESHING MACHINE CO.

(....Tenn....)

A tenant in common of land has no homestead right therein under Code, § 2986, exempting "a homestead or real estate in the possession of or belonging to each head of a family," and § 2986, giving each head of a family the right to elect where the "exemption shall be set apart, whether living on the same or not."

(Caldwell, J., and Turney, Ch. J., dissent.)

(November 5, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Rutledge County, in favor of complainant in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed in part. Affirmed in part.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Shields & Shields and R. O. Samuell for appellants.

Messrs. Ingersoll & McHenderson for appellee.

Snodgrass, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We agree with the chancellor in the conclusion reached in this case as to Joyce, and do not deem it necessary to discuss the assignments of error as to his branch of the case further than the point made that the chancellor was in error in holding that Joyce was not entitled to homestead in the land decreed to be sold because his interest in it was that of a tenant in common. His decree was upon the authority of Avans v. Everett, 8 Lea, 76, decided in September, 1879, but upon the Act of 1870; and it is earnestly and ably argued: first, that this case was originally wrong; and, second, that under our present Homestead Law, embodying the Amendment of 1879, a homestead does exist on the undivided interest of a tenant in common in "real estate;" that these words are broad and comprehensive enough to include any interest in real estate, and exempt it. The argument is put upon the ground that our present Homestead Law, in consequence of the use of the term "real estate belonging to each head of a family," now included in the law by virtue of the Act of 1879, exempts the interest of a tenant in common, because, according to Kent, and all other authors who ever treated of that subject, "real estate" includes the interest of a tenant in common, joint tenant, or any other interest in land. If that were the question being considered, there would be no controversy, or there could be no debate. As no one ever did deny that proposition, it is fair to presume that no one ever will. If the Legislature of 1879 intended to protect real estate as such, the question was settled in 1879, and before the delivery of the opinion in Avans v. Everett. But the error of the argument results from treating the Legislature as intending to protect any interest in real estate as such, and ignoring the fact that this was not (and has been construed as not) to protect real estate at all, or any interest in it, but was, and was alone, to exempt a homestead,—a right of occupancy upon such real estate as was owned by a head of a family, which he had converted, or was in a situation to convert and occupy, as a homestead, should he wish to do so. Because before 1879 it had been necessary that real estate which was possessed by a head of a family for a home must be occupied in order to give him the homestead right, the law was then so amended as to secure a debtor a homestead in land not thus occupied, but such as he might select and appropriate to that purpose when he desired. It was intended to protect that occupied as a homestead, or owned by him, in such way that he could appropriate it as such, and, of course, it either must have been converted, or been in his hands susceptible of being so converted into a homestead; that is, he must have had it in exclusive possession, or it must have been owned by him in severalty, and in a condition to be so claimed, used and appropriated, whether the estate be legal or equitable or a leasehold. That this Act did not exempt real estate as such, or any interest in it, has been since very often adjudged, and the Act held to have no extending or other effect on the law as it stood, and as an amendment, than to exempt a right of occupancy (a homestead) in real estate which was occupied or might be occupied as a home. The use of the words "or real estate" was originally supposed by some members of the profession to exempt land, or some interest in it, and the question was soon made; but this court repudiated that view, and held that the Act added nothing to the old law but an exemption of possession on $1,000 worth of land owned by the debtor, but which he did not actually occupy, and gave him the right to select the part of his land upon which the homestead should be located and thereafter exist. Flatt v. Stadler, 16 Lea, 871-879.

This case goes over the whole subject, and concludes as follows: "The whole of the Acts upon this subject should be construed together as one Act, and, if there is any seeming conflict, it should be so construed as to give effect to the will of the law-making power. But we think there is no real conflict in the object and design of the several statutes, nor any purpose by the Act of 1879 to alter the then existing law further than to give the owner of the land the power to locate his homestead upon any part of it." This opinion was at the April Term, 1886, and has ever since been followed. And see Fauver v. Fleenor, 18 Lea, 622. This ends all argument upon the broad or comprehensive terms of the Statute. It includes no more than it did before the Act of 1879, so far as interests in land are concerned, and leaves the question unembarrassed by any play upon phraseology or speculation in familiar or foreign law.

The law is just as it was when Avans v. Everett was decided, and the first question to be investigated is, Was that case right? In the first place, we remark it is evidently well considered. On its face it appears to be the unanimous opinion of the court, but we personally know that our present chief justice did not concur. This, however, only shows that it was better considered, because the dissenting view, we need not add, was pressed, and, after all that could be urged in argument or consultation, was rejected, and the case decided as it was,—against the exemption. In the next place, it was in accordance with the holding of numerous courts in many of the States, some of them of the very highest rank in the estimation of the bar throughout the Union. It was so decided in Massachusetts, California, Wisconsin and other States. A number of references to these opinions, and much quotation from them, can be found in Thompson on Homesteads and Exemptions, §§ 182-185, inclusive. They need not be restated or requoted here. Some of the States had taken the contrary view. The author of that work advocated the contrary view. He even believed that the exemption extended to partnership realty, but admits, of course, what it is superfluous to repeat, that the courts have, by a very decided weight of authority, settled the question against his views. Section 194. It is needless to add that the court of this State has so settled it. Chalfant v. Grant, 8 Lea, 118; Spiro v. Paxton, Id. 75; Gill v. Latimore, 9 Lea, 381; Hollins v. Webb, 2 Leg. Rep. 74.

Judge Cooper, who delivered the opinion of the court in Avans v. Everett, cites the sections referred to herein to sustain it and in opposition to the view we have taken of Thompson on Homesteads and Exemptions, and says the weight of authority under similar statutes is in accord with the conclusions of the court in that case. He quotes our statutes, and says: "It manifestly contemplates the occupancy of a special portion of land, capable of being set apart by metes and bounds. It is impossible to apply its provisions to an undivided interest in realty. The debtor owns nothing in severalty, and the creditor could neither ascertain, nor, of course, subject the remainder, after setting apart the homestead. Until the Legislature changes the provision of the law, or makes specific provisions for the case, we see no mode of conceding the homestead rights consistently with the equally declared rights of creditors." Page 78. This was at the September Term, 1879. The court then, at that date, assuming that the weight of authority was already with this conclusion, added to it the precedent then made in Tennessee, and thus added this State to the list of those in which it was held that the interest of a tenant in common was not exempt under the Homestead Law. For seven years that court recognized and followed the precedent then established, and for four years this court has done so. We are now urged to reverse it, and the authority rejected by the court in 3 Lea, referred to, is pressed upon us as conclusive on the other side of the question. In deciding that case the court referred to the sections of Thompson on Homesteads and Exemptions (§ 180 et seq.) embodying both views, and disagreeing with the author of that work as to the weight of authority. Among the sections thus cited and rejected was one quoted by Thompson from Freeman on Co-Tenancy and Partition and other works of the same author, saying that a co-tenant may lawfully occupy a parcel of the lands of the co-tenancy, and may employ them, not merely for cultivation or for other means of making profits, but may also build houses and barns, plant shrubs and flowers, and surround himself with all the comforts of home. His wife and children may of right occupy and employ the premises with him. Upon the land of which he is but a part owner he may, and in fact he frequently does, obtain all the advantages of a home. These advantages are none the less worthy of being secured to him and his family in adversity because other co-tenants are entitled to equal advantages in the same home. That he has not the whole is a very unsatisfactory and a very inhumane reason for depriving him of that which he has. This seems to be the stronghold of that side of the case,—of the theory that the exemption of a home to the head of a family does not mean his home, exclusively his, but means that it exempts any interest which he is authorized to possess with others, although he cannot claim any distinct parcel of it as his own, for a home or any other purpose, and this, too, upon the theory that he can go on any part of it, and may, jointly with others, use the land, and may himself improve and beautify any part or all of it.

It seems that this has so little to do with the question, under our Statute giving a homestead to him alone who owns the home or the real estate, in such way that it, or a certain part of it, can at any time be set aside to him against everybody, by three freeholders summoned by a sheriff or constable for that purpose only, that it would not be seriously cited in such question, and only needs statement, not refutation. It may be true that a co-tenant can plant shrubs and flowers in a co-tenancy, while his defrauded or defeated creditor grows weeds adjacent in a rented homestead; but surely this does not make the property so adorned the home of the debtor, in the sense of our Homestead Law; nor is there anything in our Partition Law that necessarily gives to any co-tenant the portion he elects to take or beautify. The homestead which our law contemplates is a specific parcel of land owned by him, and capable not of being partitioned in a suit in court, but of being partitioned and set apart by metes and bounds by the three freeholders summoned by the levying officer. See 8 Lea, 78. And see, for further elaboration of this question, the dissenting opinion in the case of Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82.

An argument is made that, because land can be partitioned among tenants in common on application to the courts of this State, therefore a homestead exists in favor of each one, and can be set apart to him. This is erroneous, for several reasons. In the first place, all lands or real estate held in such tenancy cannot be partitioned. A hundred tenants in common may own one small house or small tract incapable of being divided, much less making a homestead for each; and if this is answered that each interest might be sold, and separate proceeds invested, we reply that this would be impossible of small interests. Suppose the interests to bring only a few dollars. It would be totally impracticable to take it and invest it in a homestead, and let the creditor sell the fee; for it is only a homestead interest in land thus bought on reinvestment that is protected,—the fee is to be subjected to the creditor's demand. But, it is useless to discuss our Partition Law. The Homestead Law has nothing to do with it. The Homestead Law has a partition method of its own. It declares that land on which such an estate of occupancy exists is one which can be and must be partitioned or sold under the action and certificate of three freeholders summoned by the levying officer. It follows that land which cannot be so partitioned is not included. This is the argument, and it is not answered by a reply that land may be partitioned in court in this State,—a true enough proposition in itself, but having nothing to do with the question. But if we could apply by amendment our Partition Law to create a homestead, the argument is (as we have already seen) vicious, because all land cannot be partitioned. There are often dozens, sometimes hundreds, of tenants in common to whom one homestead descends. It could not have been contemplated that each would be thus split up into dozens.

Before leaving the merits of the question, it is proper to add a word respecting the sophistry of the statement quoted from Mr. Freeman, "that because a tenant has not the whole is a very unsatisfactory and a very inhumane reason for depriving him of that which he has." To make of this rhetoric a plain sentence it reads: "Because the defendant has not a whole homestead is a very unsatisfactory reason for declaring that he has not a homestead." It would seem to follow as a matter of course that if he has not a homestead the court does not deprive him of anything by saying he has not. It is neither unsatisfactory nor inhumane. On the contrary, the policy of disincumbering his small interest, or large one, held in common with others, of the restraint against alienation which the Homestead Law imposes, is to his advantage, and to the general advantage, as it leaves the property free in his hands for conveyance or for credit. Nor is it inhumane to allow it to be taken in satisfaction of his debts. If he is in debt, it is because someone has trusted him, and he has received an equal value in money or other property to that which can be taken. The creditor is not to be treated as a hostile enemy who is robbing him. He, too, may want a home, and often would have had one had he received his due. He may have a wife and children alike needing comforts. He but demands a fair show before the law to collect his debt and enable himself to acquire home and comforts; but no sentiment is wasted on him. Whatever may be the condition to which he and his are reduced by the default of the debtor, his rights are forgotten in such sentimentality as we have quoted; but they are nevertheless as dear to him, and should be as sacred to the courts. The loss of a real homestead is after all no extraordinary grievance. The loser is still as well off as thousands of other good men who pay what they owe, and live in rented houses. A man who yields it up to pay his honest debts plants a flower in his rented home that will bloom while he lives as a token of honor, and shed a fragrance above his grave when he is gone that will endure forever. It will be a treasure to his children, and children's children, when the shrubs he might have planted in a co-tenancy, which he was only able to keep by allowing his debts to remain unpaid, would have decayed by lapse of time and been blown away in the revilings of those he defeated or defrauded of justice by refusing to render them their own.

Leaving the question of right, we come to the second inquiry contemplated in this opinion, and that is whether this case should be overruled as a matter of judicial policy, having tried to establish that it should not be as a matter of judicial right. Ordinarily, a case which is doubtful may be examined and reviewed, even after many years; but it should not be done unless clearly wrong and the public good is to be subserved by overruling it. It is better that the law should be fixed and certain rather than approximately perfect. The change of ruling on any point is more or less evil. Often done, everything becomes doubtful. None can advise or act with certainty or security. But where great evils cannot flow from reversal of former rulings, it is the duty of the courts to reverse, of course, and follow a better and wiser policy in exceptional cases. The contrary is true respecting cases which have become rules of property, and under which estates have been established, and where land titles depend on the former construction. In such case it is said: "When a decision or a series of decisions has established a rule of property, and more particularly a rule affecting title to real estate, which has become generally known and been acted upon, such a land-mark should not be disturbed." Sherfy v. Argenbright, 1 Heisk. 143, 144; and see Mitchell v. Lipe, 8 Yerg. 180; Atkinson v. Dance, 9 Yerg. 427; Thompson v. Watson, 10 Yerg. 368; Smith v. McCall, 2 Humph. 163-166.

Here we have a ruling made eleven years ago, and during the intervening time again and again repeated and confirmed. Lawyers have advised their clients they could safely buy and sell these interests of tenants in common. Hundreds of sales on executions and attachments, as well as private sales, have been made. The change of ruling on that question now would destroy them all. Any person sui juris might sue to reclaim homestead in such interests sold at public sale within the last seven years, or longer, if possession was not taken and adversely held by the vendees for that period. Many such suits will be maintainable where the sales were private; while, in cases of persons under disability, no lapse of time affecting their rights, suits to recover such interests, sold either at public sale under process or privately, where the wife did not join in conveying the homestead, would be maintainable, and thus we would unsettle and destroy all estates so created. It is not the case, as put in argument for the contrary ruling, that if many have lost their property by an erroneous construction more need not do so. This ignores the real question we have just stated. If the change, that more need not be injured, was the question, change would be praiseworthy. But that is not the question. It is whether we should by one fell stroke destroy titles already vested, and lands improved under a former construction, for the fore-cited good of saving future losses. There is no policy, and less necessity, for such change of construction. Everybody has acquiesced in the one given in 1879. Judge Cooper pointed out to the Legislature the situation, and called attention to the facts that additional legislation was necessary if it was desired to exempt real estate held in co-tenancy. Five sessions of the Legislature have since followed and no change has been deemed wise or desirable. Nobody has demanded such change, and none has been made,—no effort by anybody to disturb the law in that respect. It thus appears to have met universal approbation. Credit has been received and extended on the faith of it. The effect has been far-reaching in the changes of titles and its influence on property rights and management. It is now within three months of the meeting of the next Legislature, when the evil, if such it be, for the future can be corrected without disturbing the settled transactions of the past, and it would be inexcusable for us at this time to precipitate this wide flood of trouble by a change of construction of this law. Every reason of right and policy constrains us to adhere to it, and to affirm the decree of the chancellor on this point.

We think, however, he was in error in holding defendant Jones liable to complainant, and as to him the decree is reversed. The cost of this court will be divided between complainant and defendant Joyce; that of the court below will be paid as decreed by the chancellor.

Caldwell, J., dissenting:

To secure the debt sued on, Joyce mortgaged his interest in two tracts of land, that interest being an undivided one half in one tract and an undivided one fourth in the other tract. Joyce and his wife now reside on the former tract, and have lived upon it as their home for many years. The wife did not join Joyce in the execution of the mortgage. On that ground he defends this bill to foreclose, and claims homestead for himself and family in the mortgaged lands. The chancellor denied them that right, and decreed the sale of the lands. His decree is affirmed by the majority of this court.

In denying Joyce and his family the right of homestead, Chief Justice Turney and the writer cannot agree with the majority. The Constitution and the Statute declare that the homestead shall not be alienated without the joint conveyance of the husband and wife, where that relation exists. Const. art. 11, § 11; Mill. & V. Code, § 2935. Therefore, when the husband attempts to convey the homestead without the joint conveyance of the wife, as in this case, his deed is ineffectual to pass the homestead right as to either of them, and will only vest the grantee with the husband's interest in reversion expectant on the termination of the homestead right. Maah v. Russell, 1 Lea, 543; Kennedy v. Stacy, 1 Bart. 225; Hoge v. Hollister, 2 Tenn. Ch. 612.

It follows that, if the right of homestead existed in favor of Joyce in those lands before the execution of the mortgage, it still exists, and should be allowed. But it is held by the majority that the right did not exist in the first instance because Joyce did not own the lands in severalty, but only as a tenant in common with others. Chief Justice Turney and the writer do not think this construction of the Homestead Law justified either by its letter or spirit. The wise and humane object of that law is to secure the shelter, the comfort and the independence of a home of limited value to the families of all citizens who may own an estate or interest in land capable of being in any way applied, used or enjoyed as a home. The words of the Statute are broad and comprehensive. The property around which the benefits of the exemption are thrown is described as "a homestead or real estate in the possession of or belonging to each head of a family" (Code, § 2935), whether the owner's estate therein be "legal" or "equitable," or "leasehold" (Id. §§ 2937, 2938); and "each head of a family owning real estate shall have the right to elect where the homestead, or said exemption, shall be set apart, whether living on the same or not." (Id. § 2936.) It is not easy to conceive how more plain and appropriate terms could have been used to embrace every kind and character of estate in lands. The term "real estate" means an estate in fee or for life in lands, and is used as synonymous with "lands and tenements." 8 Kent, Com. *401; 1 Washb. Real Prop. *45. Unmistakably it embraces estates in fee owned by tenants in common as well as estates in fee held in severalty. The Statute makes no distinction. It includes all estates in land, and excludes none. Estates of co-tenancy are very common in this State. They are created by our Law of Descent whenever an owner of land dies intestate, leaving children, grandchildren, etc. Such estates existed when the homestead provision was incorporated into the Constitution and statute law of the State; and, being so clearly within the object and language of that provision, they must have been in the contemplation of the law-makers, and by them deemed subject to the exemption provided. In the absence of an express declaration to that effect, we could not believe that any law-making power ever intended to extend the benefit of such an exemption to citizens owning real estate in severalty, and not to those owning undivided interests as tenants in common. A law making such a distinction would in our judgment be both impolitic and unjust. It would be an unjustifiable discrimination in favor of some persons and against others, though alike deserving of the law's favor and protection. Such is not our law, which, as we understand it, is distinctly impartial, extending the right of exemption to each head of a family owning real estate, whether in fee for life, for years, in severalty, in joint tenancy or tenancy in common.

In Arnold v. Jones, 9 Lea, 548, it was decided that the right of homestead exemption existed in favor of a life-tenant, the court saying: "If the homestead, the place of residence and home of the family, is protected where the head of the family owns the fee, much more, it seems, it ought to be in favor of the poorer man, who has only an estate less valuable, liable to be determined at any time by his death." It was also decided in Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82, that the right of homestead existed in a house and lot owned by husband and wife jointly as tenants by entireties. In the latter case, after holding that the comprehensive and unrestricted words, "real estate," should be interpreted according to their ordinary legal meaning, the court said: "The nature of the estate, or extent of the title of the beneficiary, was not of the essence of the scheme; the purpose was to stay the hand of the creditor as against a limited amount, in value, of real estate, of whatever character, belonging to any citizen who should be the head of a family. . . . Why not include the head of a family, who owns land as tenant by entirety with his wife, in the scope of a law whose purpose is so humane and commendable? To the extent of his interests, he can use the land for the shelter, support and benefit of his family, in the same manner as could another man owning the absolute fee. He stands in the same, or greater, need of the law's favor. Is he any the less deserving of protection because he does not own the whole estate? Or is the officer of the law to take what he has because he has not more? Manifestly not. The protection of such an interest is clearly within the spirit and letter of the Statute. We can conceive no satisfactory reason why the Legislature should not have intended to embrace in this wholesome provision all present interests in land naturally embraced in the language used in the Act." An eminent text-writer says: "The Homestead Laws have an object perfectly well understood, and in the promotion of which courts may well employ the most liberal and humane rules of interpretation. This object is to assure to the unfortunate debtor, and his equally unfortunate but more helpless family, the shelter and the influence of home. A co-tenant may lawfully occupy every parcel of the co-tenancy. He may employ them, not merely for cultivation or for other means of making profit, but may also build houses and barns, plant shrubs and flowers, and surround himself with all the comforts of home. His wife and children may of right occupy and enjoy the premises with him. Upon the land of which he is but a part owner, he may and in fact frequently does, obtain all the advantages of a home. These advantages are none the less worthy of being secured to him and his family in adversity because the other co-tenants are entitled to equal advantages in the same home. That he has not the whole is a very unsatisfactory and a very inhumane reason for depriving him of that which he has." Freeman, Exemptions, § 248. To this view Thompson lends the weight of his opinion. Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, §§ 181, 188.

It is said, in substance, by the majority that estates of co-tenancy must be excluded from the exemption because no particular mode for the assignment of the homestead in lands held by co-tenants is expressly prescribed. To this we say the general provisions on this subject, as contained in sections 2940, 2941 and 2944 of the Code, in connection with those then and now existing in Code, §§ 8993, 4024, on the subject of partition and sale for division, afford the amplest direction and remedy for the allotment of homestead in every case, whether the claimant have an estate in severalty or in co-tenancy with others. Hence, in the absence of an express exclusion of co-tenants from the benefits of a law whose terms are so broad and whose purpose is so general, we think they should be held to be included. In our opinion, it is a harsh and unwise construction that excludes such persons from the beneficial operation of a law whose provisions are, in express terms, for the advantage of "each head of a family" owning real estate. Such a rule of interpretation should not be applied in this case, for the courts almost universally indulge a liberal construction in favor of the right of homestead. Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, §§ 4, 7, 781; Dickinson v. Mayer, 11 Helsk. 520; Arnold v. Jones, 9 Lea, 548; White v. Fulgum, 87 Tenn. 284; Jackson v. Shelton, 89 Tenn. 82. This liberality of construction extends as well to the assignment of homestead as to the ascertainment of the existence of the right. By the indulgence of such rule of construction the courts will readily find in existing statutes all necessary means for the assignment of homestead in lands held by tenants in common. In the case before us the complainant would only have to bring the other co-tenants before the court, and have the lands partitioned in kind, if that could be done, and, if not, have them sold for division of the proceeds. The interest of the debtor being thus separated from that of others, the creditor and debtor could each be protected by decree in conformity to the Statute. This might be some inconvenience to the creditor, but mere inconvenience in the assignment of homestead should not be allowed to defeat the right of exemption itself. No mere matter of inconvenience in the administration of a law can operate to its amendment; yet the reasons given for denying the right by the courts of those States which hold that homestead is not allowable in cases of co-tenancy are reasons of convenience merely. Thompson, Homesteads and Exemptions, § 188.

The majority opinion follows the case of Avans v. Everett, 8 Lea, 76. But, not agreeing to the reasoning or conclusion in that case, we think it should now be overruled, as contrary to the manifest purpose and plain language of the constitutional and statutory provisions for the exemption of the homestead to "each head of a family owning real estate." The reasoning of the court in that case is found in the following extract from the opinion: "The Statute manifestly contemplates the occupancy of a specific portion of land, capable of being set apart by metes and bounds. It is impossible to apply its provisions to an undivided interest in realty. The debtor owns nothing in severalty, and the creditor could neither ascertain, nor, of course, subject the remainder after setting apart the homestead." 8 Lea, 78. To our minds, the difficulty of applying these "provisions to an individual interest in realty" is entirely removed by the Statutes of Partition, under which one co-tenant's interest may be ascertained and separated from that of other co-tenants, either by partition in kind or by a sale of the whole land for a division of proceeds. By this means the rights of both creditor and debtor may be amply protected, while by the doctrine of that case those of the debtor are entirely destroyed, and those of the creditor augmented. The importance of uniformity and stability in judicial decisions can scarcely be exaggerated. Nevertheless, when it appears that a decision has departed from the plain mandate of the Constitution and the Statute, as we believe to be true of that case, it should be overruled, and not longer followed. A decision which misinterprets a law, and renders a provision which is just and impartial in its terms both partial and unjust in its administration, as we think that one does, should be departed from whenever the mistake is discovered. That many debtors have lost their homesteads under the doctrine of that case, and that reparation cannot now be made, are not sound reasons for its perpetuation, and for forcing others to undergo a like deprivation in the future. We think that case should now be overruled, and that Joyce and family should not be driven from a place that has afforded them the shelter, comfort and independence of a home so long.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Lewis H. WILSON

v.

Augusta A. WILSON.

(....Mass.....)

Connivance by a husband in his wife's adultery is not shown, where already suspect- ing her to be guilty, he merely suffers her in a single instance to avail herself of an opportunity therefor which she has already arranged without his knowledge, even though he purposely refrains from warning her because he hopes to obtain evidence which will entitle him to a divorce.

(June 27, 1891.)

NOTE.—Connivance as a defense to suit for divorce on the ground of adultery.

Connivance on the part of the husband will, in point of law, bar him from obtaining relief on account of adultery which he has allowed to take place. Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 58; Myers v. Myers, 41 Barb. 114.

A husband may be debarred from a divorce by active procurement or passive toleration of his wife's adultery. Crewe v. Crewe, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 129.

If the husband connives at the wife's adultery, if he knows that she is living in an improper manner, if he is aware of what is going on, he will be prevented from obtaining relief by divorce. Hodges v. Hodges, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 119.

A husband who consents to the adultery of his wife is not entitled to a divorce. Woodward v. Woodward, 3 Cent. Rep. 368, 41 N. J. Eq. 224.

Relief will be refused to a husband who wanted his wife to commit some offense which will enable him to get rid of her and was willing that she should be lured into such a course of conduct as would warrant the legal presumption that she had committed adultery. Cane v. Cane, 39 N. J. Eq. 148.

Connivance by a wife in her husband's adultery will prevent her from using such adultery as a defense to a suit by him for a divorce because of her adultery. Bleck v. Bleck, 27 Hun, 297.

Weight to be given to the English decisions upon the subject.

The general principles which govern the ecclesiastical courts in England were adopted in this country so far as they were applicable and found to be reasonable. Robbins v. Robbins, 1 New Eng. 12 L. R. A.

Rep. 484, 140 Mass. 528; Morrison v. Morrison, 2 New Eng. Rep. 729, 142 Mass. 861.

But the decisions of the English ecclesiastical courts are not of the same weight in this country as in England. Robbins v. Robbins, supra.

Definition of connivance.

To sustain the defense of connivance the facts must show that the husband so connived at the wife's adultery as to give willing consent to it. Mere negligence, mere inattention, mere dullness of apprehension, mere indifference will not suffice; there must be an intention on his part that she should commit adultery. If such a state of things exists as will in the apprehension of reasonable men result in the wife's adultery, whether that state of things is produced by the connivance of the husband or independent of it, and if the husband intending that the result of adultery shall take place does not interfere when he might do so, he is guilty of connivance. Allen v. Allen, 80 L. J. N. S. 2.

Connivance is an act of the mind; it implies knowledge and acquiescence. A willing mind is all that is necessary. Boulting v. Boulting, 38 Swab. & T. 329.

There must be corrupt connivance, corruption being a necessary ingredient to bar a suit. Phillips v. Phillips, 3 Notes of Cases, 444; 1 Rob. Eccl. 144, S. C. on appeal, 4 Notes of Cases, 523, 10 Jur. 829, 5 Notes of Cases, 435.

The husband need not necessarily have been an accessory before the fact or have taken active measures to bring about the result of adultery, but it must appear that he was cognizant that such a result would follow from transactions of which he

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of a suit brought to secure a divorce in which a decree had been entered dismissing the libel. New trial granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. William B. Orcutt and E. J. Jenkins, for libellant:

Libellant, having had cause previously to suspect his wife's fidelity, on December 11 watched her movements, to get evidence, if he could, of her infidelity. This he had a right to do. He put no temptation in her way; he simply watched her own movements. All the opportunities for the commission of the act of adultery were of her own making. The husband has the right to so watch his wife and permit her licentiousness to take its full scope, and the obtaining of evidence in this manner will not bar his right to a divorce.

Timmings v. Timmings, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 76, 5 Eng. Eccl. 22, 25; Pierce v. Pierce, 3 Pick. 299; Oloves v. Oloves, 9 Jur. 356; Cairns v. Cairns, 109 Mass. 408.

Even a scheme to detect the adultery of the wife, and without which the adultery would not have been committed, does not amount to connivance.

Robbins v. Robbins, 1 New Eng. Rep. 484, 140 Mass. 528.

Mr. Joseph G. Holt, for libelee:

If upon the hearing of a libel for divorce for adultery there are facts and circumstances from which the inference of connivance may be fairly drawn, this court cannot determine the weight and effect of the evidence and revise the finding.

Morrison v. Morrison, 136 Mass. 810, and cases cited.

A corrupt intention is necessary to constitute connivance. This consent must necessarily often be inferred from the circumstances, but the fact must be found that the libellant either desired and intended, or at least was willing, that the libelee should commit adultery, before the libellant can be said to have connived at it.

Ibid.; Robbins v. Robbins, 1 New Eng. Rep. 484, 140 Mass. 528.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case turns on the question whether the approved, and to which he consented. Glennie v. Glennie, 8 Jur. N. S. 1158.

But no blindness or weakness short of actual, willing consent beforehand to the wife's adultery will constitute connivance so as to bar a suit for divorce. Marris v. Marris, 3 Swab. & T. 580.

Mere failure of the husband to take notice of, and be warned by, acts which to other people look suspicious is not sufficient to show connivance on his part. Burgess v. Burgess, 3 Hagg. Consist. 225.

It was not necessary that any active steps should be taken on the part of the husband to corrupt the wife; passive acquiescence would be sufficient provided it appeared to be done with the intention, and with the expectation, that she would be guilty of the crime, but there must at all events be consent. Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 58; Moorsom v. Moorsom, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 107.

It is not sufficient that the man did not act as a wise or prudent or attentive man, nor that he in fact contributed to his wife's guilt; he must either show an intention to contribute thereto or there must be intentional permission or corrupt facility. Moorsom v. Moorsom, supra.

If the husband sees what a reasonable man could not permit, he must be supposed to see and mean the consequences; but the presumption of law is against connivance and if the fact can be accounted for without supposition of intention the court will incline to that instruction. Moorsom v. Moorsom, supra.

A husband is not barred by a mere permission of opportunity for adultery. He is at perfect liberty to let the licentiousness of the wife take its full scope. He cannot, however, contrive the meeting or place the parties together and then depart for the purpose of giving opportunity. Timmings v. Timmings, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 83.

To establish connivance it is not necessary to show knowledge of or privy to the actual commission of adultery. Such extreme negligence to the conduct of the wife and such encouragement of acquaintance and familiar intimacy as are likely to lead to an adulterous intercourse are sufficient. Gilpin v. Gilpin, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 150.

The word "conniving," as used in the English Statute, 20 and 21 Vict. chap. 85, means, not merely refusing to see an act of adultery, but also willful abstaining from taking any step to prevent adulterous intercourse which from what passes before the husband's eyes he must reasonably expect will occur. Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. Cas. 1.

Illustrations of connivance.

Mere imprudence and error of judgment are not connivance. So held where the husband, in order to get rid of the man with whom the wife afterward committed adultery, told him of confessions which the wife had made to the husband of her attachment for the paramour. Hoar v. Hoar, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 140.

Failure to remove from a town where a mere casual residence was maintained upon suspecting his wife of too great intimacy with another man, and frequent absences from her on hunting expeditions, will not amount to connivance. Hamerton Hamerton, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 12.

Where the husband takes money from his wife's paramour as the price of not resorting to his legal remedy, and then leaves the wife in a situation likely to occasion a renewal of adulterous intercourse with the same person, he is guilty of such connivance as to bar a suit for divorce. Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. Cas. 1.

Permitting a servant to remain in his house after he knows of great and indecent familiarities between the servant and his wife amounts to such connivance as will bar the husband of a right to divorce. Lovering v. Lovering, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 86.

Where the husband not only knew of suspicious relations between his wife and a servant, but appeared quite willing that they should unite their futures, if he did not actually connive at and further the conduct of the servant, a divorce will be refused. Herriek v. Herriek, 31 Mich. 238.

Introducing the wife to persons of bad character may be evidence of connivance. Graves v. Graves, 3 Curt. Eccl. 235.

Where from evidence in the case it appeared that the husband was witness of acts lasting some time, from which the very worst inferences might be drawn, without in any way interfering and without objecting afterward, there is such a strong indication of his intention to have his wife transgress, or at least to allow her to do so undisturbed and unprevented, that it amounts to connivance and operates as a bar to his suit. Bourgeois v. Chauvin, 30 La. Ann. 216.

Where a wife with full knowledge of the facts finding of the court was correct that the libelant was, upon the evidence, guilty of connivance.

The libelant did nothing to encourage his wife to commit adultery and did not directly nor indirectly throw opportunities in her way. Until the day he detected her, the report does not show that any unusual or improper acts had occurred in his presence between her and any other man. He had suspected and had watched her, but had not obtained proof of her guilt, and had not, till the day he caught her, had the assistance of a detective or police officer. On that day he came from his home in Dorchester and waited suspecting she might come to Boston also and might leave the Dorchester car at the corner of Federal and Beach Streets, which she did. She met a man by the name of Andrews, whom there is nothing to show the libelant had ever seen or heard of before, and went with him to the hotel. The libelant followed her and after waiting in the hotel an hour, and listening ten or fifteen minutes at the door of the room where they were, burst it open and found them in bed together. He hoped she would commit adultery so that he could get a divorce and he gave her plenty of time and did not warn her so that she might do it. He thought before this that she had committed adultery.

We think as matter of law it cannot be said on this state of facts that the libelant was guilty of connivance. It is true that he could have prevented his wife from committing adultery and did not; on the contrary, he wished she would, that he might have evidence on which he could get a divorce. But he did not make or aid in any way in making the opportunity. He did no overt act unless keeping still was one, which it clearly was not. It was not a case where he supposed his wife was about to commit adultery for the first time, and where it would have been his duty to have given her the assistance which husband and wife are mutually expected to give to each other. It certainly cannot be held that a husband who suspects his wife of infidelity can take no means to ascertain the truth of his suspicions without being remained quiet for seventeen years without complaining of her husband's cohabitation with another woman or applying to the courts for relief, relief was denied. Boulting v. Boulting, 8 Swab. & T. 829.

Duty of husband and wife to watch over and assist each other; consequence of neglect.

Husband and wife ought mutually to aid each other in doing right and to guard each other from doing wrong. Robbins v. Robbins, 1 New Eng. Rep. 486, 140 Mass. 523.

A husband is expected by law to pay due attention to the behavior of his wife and to give her the benefit of some superintendence where she is placed in dangerous situations. Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Consist. 155.

But a chaste husband ought, if he desires it, to have a wife who will remain chaste when exposed to the temptations which are incident to ordinary conditions of modern social life, and if she commits adultery against his wishes and without his procurement he ought to be permitted to obtain evidence of it. Robbins v. Robbins, supra.

Every husband is bound to give his wife that protection which the society of a husband affords, and the fact that the wife had been familiar with him before marriage makes that duty more incumbent upon him. Hawkins v. Hawkins, L. R. 10 Prob. & Div. 177; Graves v. Graves, 3 Curt. Ecol. 285.

A man marrying a young woman whom he had previously seduced is bound to exercise more than ordinary marital care over her conduct and deportment. Dillon v. Dillon, 3 Curt. Ecol. 88.

A husband who seduces his wife before marriage and after marriage sees her in a situation of temptation and does nothing to rescue her, and she yields, will be understood as having consented to her adultery. Cane v. Cane, 39 N. J. Eq. 148.

If a husband sees what a reasonable man could not see without alarm, or if he knows that his wife had been guilty of antenuptial incontinence, or if he himself had seduced her before marriage, he is called upon to exercise peculiar vigilance and care over her, and if he sees what a reasonable man could not permit and makes no effort to avert the danger, he must be supposed to see and mean the result. Hedden v. Hedden, 21 N. J. Eq. 70.

Great inattention on the part of the husband will not bar him to establish the defense of connivance; he must have been privy to her guilt, or have led her into the crime. Rix v. Rix, 3 Hagg. Ecol. 74.

But in Harris v. Harris, 7 Hagg. Ecol. 415, the court states that it can conceive that a case might arise of such willful neglect or exposure as might, without proving actual connivance, possibly bar the husband of all remedy by a divorce. He might introduce his wife to society so abandoned, and expose her to risks so great, as to render a deviation from the paths of chastity the most probable, if not the necessary, consequence; but the mere introduction of the wife to a woman who was maintaining improper relation to another man is not sufficient to show connivance if the particular acts of adultery charged did not flow from such introduction.

Under the English statutes willful neglect or misconduct may deprive a petitioner of his right to a divorce, but in order to do so it must have concluded to his wife's first fall. St. Paul v. St. Paul, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 739.

Where a husband broke up his home and sold his furniture for the purpose of getting rid of his wife, made her no allowance and never saw her until eight years after the separation, when he met her by accident, and five years afterward brought suit for divorce on the ground of her adultery, he was held to be guilty of such connivance as to bar his right to the relief prayed. Heyes v. Heyes, L. R. 13 Prob. & Div. 11.

The absence of the husband from the wife and the withdrawal of her allowance by the husband's father, the husband himself having no means of subsistence independent of the father, although accompanied by the setting up of persons to watch the wife and expressions of satisfaction upon obtaining proof that she had committed adultery, are not sufficient to show connivance if there is nothing to show that she was driven to, nor entrapped into, the adultery by the conduct of the husband. Cloves v. Cloves, 9 Jur. 354.

Where a minor, who was dependent upon his father for support, secretly married a woman whom he afterward suspected of being unchaste, left her with instructions to a friend to watch her conduct and furnished her with no support because of his inability to do so, he was not guilty of connivance so as to bar a suit for divorce, if he did nothing to lead her into temptation after leaving her. Reeves v. Reeves, 2 Phil. Ecol. 125.

The abandonment by a minor, dependent on his family for support, of his wife, is not sufficient to deemed guilty of connivance. "There is a manifest distinction," says the court in Robbins v. Robbins, 140 Mass. 581, 1 New Eng. Rep. 484, "between the desire and intent of a husband that his wife, whom he believes to be chaste, should commit adultery, and his desire and intent to obtain evidence against his wife, whom he believes already to have committed adultery and to persist in her adulterous practices whenever she has opportunity." Merely suffering in a single case a wife whom he already suspects of having been guilty of adultery to avail herself to the full extent of an opportunity to indulge her adulterous disposition, which she has arranged without his knowledge, does not constitute connivance on the part of the husband, even though he hopes he may obtain proof which will entitle him to a divorce, and purposely refrains from warning her for that reason. He may properly watch his wife, whom he suspects of adultery, in order to obtain proof of that fact. He may do it with the hope and purpose of getting a divorce if he obtains sufficient evidence. He must not, however, make opportunities for her though he may leave her free to follow opportunities which she has herself made. He is not obliged to throw obstacles in her way, but he must not smooth her path to the adulterous bed. 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. 5th ed. § 9; Timmings v. Timmings, 8 Hagg. Eccl. 76; Storer v. Storer, 1 Rob. Eccl. 99-101; Phillips v. Phillips, 10 Jur. 849.

The law does not compel a husband to remain always bound to a wife whom he suspects, and it allows him, as it does other parties who think they are being wronged, reasonable scope in their efforts to discover whether the suspected party is or is not guilty, without themselves being adjudged guilty of conniving at the crime which they are seeking to detect. Robbins v. Robbins, supra. In a libel for divorce for desertion the willingness, or even the desire, of the deserted party to be deserted, so long as it is not expressed in conduct or acts to the other party, show connivance at her subsequent adultery so as to bar a suit for divorce. Morgan v. Morgan, 3 Curt. Eccl. 679.

Effect of neglect and cruelty.

Course and brutal behavior, obscene and disgusting language, even disregard of decorum, will not constitute connivance; nor will cruelty and desertion, though they tend to induce a wife to disregard her own duties and tempt her to commit adultery. Facts to constitute connivance must have a direct and necessary tendency to cause adultery to be committed or continued. Stone v. Stone, 3 Notes of Cases, 305.

Indifference, ill-behavior or cruelty cannot be shown in support of a defense of connivance. Moorsom v. Moorsom, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 92.

A charge that the husband was guilty of cruelty towards his wife with the purpose of inducing adultery and thereby enabling him to obtain a separation is not admissible in defense of a suit for divorce on the ground of adultery, although the court intimates in that case that there may possibly be cases where cruelty on the part of the husband directly leads up to the wife's adultery, but intimates no opinion as to the result. Dillon v. Dillon, 3 Curt. Eccl. 86.

Obtaining proof.

The husband need not bring suit the moment he suspects his wife of infidelity; he may wait for adequate proof, but he must show reasonable vigilance and delay no longer than is necessary to obtain proof. Crewe v. Crewe, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 122.

But a husband who has suspicions of infidelity of his wife will not be allowed to lay a train which may lead her to the commission of adultery in order that he may take advantage of it to obtain a divorce. Pierce v. Pierce, 3 Pick. 299.

Connivance at adultery with different men.

A husband who endeavors to procure his wife to be lured into the commission of adultery will be regarded as consenting to all subsequent acts of adultery which she may commit whether they be committed with the persons selected by him or with others. Woodward v. Woodward, 3 Cent. Rep. 368, 41 N. J. Eq. 234.

A husband who connives at or assents to adultery by his wife with one person will be deemed as assenting to it with others and will not be entitled to a divorce for the subsequent act with a different person. Hedden v. Hedden, 21 N. J. Eq. 70, citing Timmings v. Timmings, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 76; 13 L. R. A.

Lovering v. Lovering Id. 85; Stone v. Stone, 1 Rob. Eccl. 99; Hodges v. Hodges, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 112, contra as overruled.

Connivance at one act with one man will not necessarily bar a divorce for adultery by a prior act with another man, but the circumstances may be so open, gross and revolting that the court will find no injury done to the husband and therefore no right to redress. Morrison v. Morrison, 2 New Eng. Rep. 729, 142 Mass. 361.

Corruption inferred.

If a system of connivance at improper familiarity almost amounting to proximate acts be established, corrupt intention will be inferred without more direct proof. Moorsom v. Moorsom, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 92.

Connivance by the wife.

The courts appear to favor the wife to a considerable degree in determining what acts will amount to connivance on her part. The reason of this is perhaps the dependent condition of the wife and the smaller opportunity on her part to know of her husband's familiarity with other women and lack of ability to prevent it.

Thus in a suit for separation for the husband's adultery with his wife's sister proof that the wife after knowledge of previous adultery allowed under peculiar circumstances the sister to accompany them to India and to live in the same house with them will not bar the wife on the ground of connivance, her conduct not being traced to any motive necessarily criminal. Turton v. Turton, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 388.

Although the wife knows of adultery on the part of the husband and continues to live with him and by her own acts gives opportunity for intercourse between her husband and his paramour, it does not necessarily show that she assents to his crimes and conspires to drive him to their commission. Cochran v. Cochran, 35 Iowa, 479.

A wife's consent to a deed of separation which secures an allowance to her is not sufficient to show her connivance at her husband's adultery in the absence of evidence that at the time the deed was made she was aware of the adulterous intercourse and consented to it. Ross v. Ross, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 784.

But if a wife, although unwilling to consent that her husband should live in adultery, ultimately gives her consent for the sake of obtaining an allowance from him, she is guilty of connivance. Ibid.

will not bar a divorce. Ford v. Ford, 148 Mass. 577, 8 New Eng. Rep. 785.

Of course, as the court says in that case, there is always the difficulty of believing that the desire or willingness did not manifest itself in conduct or acts expressive of it to the other party. But nothing of the sort appears here.

In St. Paul v. St. Paul, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 789, the court held that the neglect of the husband which would justify the court in withholding a decree in his favor under a statute which provided that the court might do so where the husband was guilty of "such willful neglect or misconduct as . . . conducted to the adultery," must be such neglect as conducted to his wife's fall, and not neglect conducting to any particular act of adultery subsequent to her fall.

The case of Morrison v. Morrison, 186 Mass. 810, referred to by the libelee, differs from this. In that case the husband, after he had been cautioned to watch his wife, made opportunities for her and her suspected paramour to be together alone, witnessed without objection acts of considerable familiarity between them, said nothing whatever to his wife, intimating any disapproval of her conduct, and in other ways acted in such a manner as to induce the adultery for which he was watching.

In the opinion of the court there must therefore, according to the reservation of the report, be a new trial granted, and it is so ordered.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

TOWN OF KOSCIUSKO, Appt.,

v.

Solomon SLOMBERG.

(....Miss....)

An ordinance prohibiting second-hand clothing from being brought into, or offered for sale within, a town, without first proving that it did not come from a place where contagion or infection is, or has been, prevailing, is unreasonable and void in the absence of any epidemic or other apparent necessity therefor.

(April 20, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Attala County in favor of defendant in a proceeding to recover a fine from defendant for dealing in second-hand clothing without complying with a municipal ordinance. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Anderson, Haden & Davis for appellant.

Messrs. Allen & McCool for appellee.

Woods, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charter of the Town of Kosciusko confers upon the authorities of that municipality the power of establishing and enforcing quarantine and other regulations necessary to the health of the town; of making regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants of the town, and to prevent and remove nuisances; and of passing all ordinances, which may be necessary to carry into effect the powers conferred. In supposed pursuance of these charter powers, the municipal authorities adopted an ordinance declaring it unlawful for any person to bring into the Town or to offer for sale therein second-hand clothing, without first having produced satisfactory proof to the mayor of the Town that such clothing did not come from a district or locality in which any contagion or infection was prevailing or had prevailed. The power to prevent the introduction of infectious and contagious diseases, by appropriate regulations, is not to be disputed. But to justify the sweeping and far-reaching use of the power exercised in the ordinance in the case before us, there must be, at least, some circumstances apparently rendering such exercise of this power necessary for the preservation of the health of the public. The Town may quarantine, in cases demanding that extraordinary measure, in seasons of epidemic, in the interest of public health, but to justify the exercise of this power there must be apparent necessity for so doing. In such cases regulations unpleasantly or injuriously affecting the individual may be properly employed to accomplish the general safety. But, in the absence of any epidemic apparently requiring the use of quarantine regulations and regulations restraining trade temporarily, the exercise of such power, in the manner employed in the ordinance in the Town of Kosciusko, becomes unreasonable and oppressive. The ordinance is in restraint of a legitimate trade, and is unequal and unjust in its terms and operation. It cannot be contended that a second-hand clothing store is a nuisance per se, or that second-hand goods are infectious in their nature. If brought from a locality in which infectious and contagious diseases are prevailing or have recently prevailed, second-hand goods might properly be regarded as endangering the general safety and public health; but the same is equally true of new and unused goods. Between the new and the second-hand, the difference, at the most, is a degree in danger only. Why impose the burden in the one case, and not in the other? And why impose, in either case, where there is no pretext of apparent necessity for such interference with lawful traffic? The ordinance is clearly an unreasonable and unjust interference with a legitimate and recognized business pursuit, and is a permanent restraint upon trade.

Affirmed.

NOTE.—That municipal ordinances attempting to regulate business must be reasonable, see 12 L. R. A.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

AMERICAN MORTGAGE CO., of Scotland, Limited, Pff. in Err.,

v.

TENNILLE.

(....Ga....)

*1. Under the Act of February 8, 1877, providing that the State of Georgia will not consent to foreign corporations owning 5,000 or more acres of land in this State, unless they shall become incorporated under the laws of Georgia, the State alone can make the question as to the right of such corporations to hold said land.

2. A motion to dismiss an affidavit of illegality was rightly denied when at least one of the grounds thereof presented a legal defense against the further progress of the execution.

NOTE.—Escheat defined.

The word "escheat," originally French or Norman, signifying chance or accident, is now applied to the obstruction of the course of descent and determination of tenure by some contingency, in which case the land by a kind of reversion results back to the original grantor (2 Bl. Com. 244). In feudal law it results back to the lord from extinction of the blood of the tenant by natural or by civil means (1 Bl. Com. 72). So if the tenant died without heirs of his blood, or if his blood was corrupted by commission of treason or felony, the land "fell back" to the lord of the fee. Ibid.

In the United States, however, there can be no attain of blood by the commission of crime. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 9, cl. 3.

At common law if a bastard die intestate and without issue, his real estate escheats. Doe v. Bates, 6 Blackf. 538; Bent v. St. Vrain, 30 Mo. 268.

In the United States it implies a reversion of property to the State in default of a person who can inherit it. Anderson, Dict. 413.

When the owner of real estate dies intestate, without heirs capable of inheriting it, the title thereof devolves by operation of law upon the State. Ill. Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 225; Wallahan v. Ingersoll, 5 West. Rep. 124, 117 Ill. 123.

Land is not subject to escheat, until the failure of heirs of original grantees. Hall v. Gittings, 2 Har. & J. 112.

Question of escheat, how determined.

The question of the escheat of a decedent's property for non-existence of heirs can be determined only by the method provided by the statute; it cannot be determined in a proceeding by an heir to restrain the escheator. Muir v. Thomson, 28 S. C. 499.

It must be established by a judicial proceeding in the proper court, in the name of the people, for the purposes of proving and establishing it by judicial determination. Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 225. Wallahan v. Ingersoll, 5 West. Rep. 124, 117 Ill. 123.

The proceeding is in the nature of an inquest of office, and the record of it is the only competent evidence by which a title by escheat can be established. Den v. O'Hanlon, 21 N. J. L. 562; Crane v. Reeder, 21 Mich. 24; Com. v. Hite, 6 Leigh, 568; People v. Cutting, 3 Johns. 1.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Quitman County to review an order dismissing the levy of an execution upon defendant's real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William E. Simmons and W. C. Worrill for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. D. Kiddoo for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Tennille executed and delivered to J. K. O. Sherwood a promissory note, and at the same time, in order to secure the same, made and delivered to said Sherwood a deed to certain land. Sherwood transferred the note, and conveyed the land to the American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, who sued the note to judgment in the Superior Court of Quitman County, and an execution issued thereon was levied upon the land described in the aforesaid the people, it is void upon its face. Wallahan v. Ingersoll, supra.

Where land is declared escheated for want of heirs, persons claiming to be heirs may come in under the statute and obtain an order for leave to make up an issue at law to have their right determined. Ex parte Williams, 13 Rich. L. 77.

The right of action to recover lands escheats to the State upon the death of the owner without heirs or next of kin. Johnston v. Spioer, 9 Cent. Rep. 566, 107 N. Y. 185.

Equity cannot enjoin proceedings to have an escheat declared where, if escheat should be found, every question presented could be decided on a traverse. Olmsted's App. 86 Pa. 234.

An amicus curiae cannot move to quash an inquiry unless he has an interest or represents somebody who has. Dunlop v. Com. 2 Call (Va.) 284.

Action to declare escheat; practice and procedure.

The circuit court of the county is vested with general powers over the subject matter of escheats; nevertheless, the court must be put in motion by filing an information, and by issue of scire facias against all alleged to hold, possess or claim such estate. Wallahan v. Ingersoll, 5 West. Rep. 124, 117 Ill. 123.

The names of all persons in possession of the premises, and such as were known to claim an interest therein, must be set forth in the information, and the scire facias must be served on them personally; as to all other persons constructive service is sufficient. Ibid.

A return which shows service on only one of two occupants is insufficient to confer jurisdiction. Ibid.

The information must require them to appear and show cause why it should not be vested in the State; and the court is required to make an order to that effect. Ibid.

The order to appear and show cause must be published. Ibid.

Jurisdiction as to the subject matter depends on the performance of all these acts. Ibid.

Notice of proceedings.

Jurisdiction depends on the statutory requirements as to notice being complied with. Wiederanders v. State, 64 Tex. 133.

The validity of escheat proceedings is not affected by the want of formal notice and by the deed, the Mortgage Company having previously filed in the clerk's office a deed purporting to reconvey the land to said Tennille, for the purpose of making this levy. To the levy of the execution Tennille filed his affidavit of illegality, containing several grounds, one of which was as follows, viz.: That "the said plaintiff was a foreign corporation, has never been incorporated by the laws of Georgia and owned more than 5,000 acres of land in said State (so far as to claim the same and hold deeds thereto), in conflict with and against the laws of said State and therefore could not hold the title to lands, or convey the same to the defendant, legally." The defendant served on the plaintiff a notice to produce at the trial a number of papers, and among them the charter of the plaintiff, and deeds from fourteen persons to Sherwood, and from Sherwood to the plaintiff, covering various lands in Randolph and Quitman Counties; the use intended to be made of said deeds being to prove the ground of illegality above quoted. The court held that said charter and these deeds should be produced, and, upon the plaintiff's failure to do so, ordered the levy of the execution to be dismissed. We can see no error in requiring the production of the charter, as it might contain evidence supporting one of the grounds of the illegality. The main question, therefore, upon which this court is asked to pass in this case, is whether or not the ground of illegality setting forth plaintiff's inability to hold land in excess of 5,000 acres is good in law, and consequently whether or not the plaintiff should have been required to produce said deeds.

1. It seems to be well settled that, in a case of this kind, the State alone is authorized to assert her policy in prohibiting foreign corporations from holding 5,000 or more acres of land in Georgia, and that individuals have no right to make the question in controversies with each other. Numerous decisions may be found to the effect that, where a corporation acquires or uses land to any extent or for any purpose not authorized by its charter, the question of its right so to do cannot be made by an individual in a legal controversy with the corporation, or with those claiming under it, but must be fact that others not notified did not appear. One appearing is entitled to a separate trial of his traverse. Re Malone, 21 S. C. 435.

S. C. Gen. Stat., § 2303, requiring the publication of a notice of escheat the first week in every month for a required time, is satisfied by one publication in a weekly newspaper, and does not require its publication in a daily paper every day of the week. Eason v. Witcofskey, 29 S. C. 229.

The statutory prohibition of service of process on a Sunday does not render void a publication in a Sunday paper of the notice of escheat under this section, nor does the statute forbidding the doing of labor on a Sunday avoid such notice. Ibid. See Genobles v. West, 23 S. C. 163.

The information.

An information for lands claimed to have escheated may be made the subject of an original action or of a counterclaim by the State. When filed as a counterclaim and the original action dismissed, defendant still has the right to a trial. Reid v. State, 74 Ind. 202.

It must appear that the owners were foreigners; that they died without issue and left no relations within the United States entitled by law to the succession. Catham v. State, 2 Head, 533.

A complaint alleging that there are no resident heirs must, under the Indiana Act of March 9, 1861, further allege that the nonresident alien heirs did not convey the land during eight years preceding that date. State v. Witz, 37 Ind. 190.

Traverse of information.

Proceedings to escheat the estate of an intestate without heirs or kindred may be traversed by any person, including his administratrix, in whose possession the estate is found. Com. v. Crompton, 137 Pa. 123.

In New York the traverser is considered as a defendant, and by showing that the people have no title, he need prove nothing but a bare possession in himself. People v. Cutting, 3 Johns. 1.

The escheator who is defendant to the petition has the same right to plead the Statute of Limitations that the representative of the debtor would have. Watson v. Lyle, 4 Leigh, 236.

In Texas claims for improvement are not allowed in actions of escheat. Brown v. State, 36 Tex. 222. 12 L. R. A.

Trial.

Traversers of an escheat have no precedence over others on the docket of cases. Lance v. Dobson, Riley (S. C.) 301.

Where an inquest is traversed and the case comes on for trial in the common pleas, the traverser is entitled to begin and conclude to the jury. Com. v. Desilver, 2 Ashm. 163.

In a monstrans de droit to an inquisition prosecuted under the statute, the monstrant is plaintiff. French v. Com. 5 Leigh, 612.

He must show a good title in himself to entitle him to a judgment of amoscas manus. Ibid.

Evidence; Findings.

There is a presumption of law that every person dying leaves heirs, and it must be rebutted by one who would claim under an alleged escheat. Evidence may be competent as negating the presumption, without being sufficient to change the burden of proof. North Carolina University v. Harrison, 90 N. C. 335.

The law will not presume that a person died without heirs, and the absence of a claim under the patentee for many years, accounted for by the land being covered with navigable waters, is insufficient to establish an escheat. Peterkin v. Inloes, 4 Md. 175.

Some negative proof is required that a person proved to be dead left no heirs; the law will not presume it in favor of escheat. Hammond v. Inloes, 4 Md. 138.

Nor will the law presume that a person died under the age of ninety years. Ibid.

The finding in favor of the Commonwealth will not deprive of title a purchaser claiming under a deed of bargain and sale executed and recorded before the inquest was sealed, though not known by bargainee till afterward. Com. v. Selden, 5 Munf. 160.

An inquisition that does not find that decedent died intestate and without heirs or known kindred is a nullity and constitutes no lien on real estate. Ramsay's App. 2 Watts, 223.

Effect of escheat proceedings.

A suit to subject escheated lands to a debt of the former owner, where the State is not made a party, is inoperative to affect the title of the State. Sands v. Lynham, 37 Gratt. 231.

raised directly by a proceeding instituted for that purpose by the State wherein such corporation is exercising such powers ultra vires. Some of these decisions were made by the courts of the States in which the corporations themselves were created, and others in States outside of which the corporations involved had been chartered. None of them are directly in point as to the precise question made in the case now before us, because the disability of the corporations arose under the provisions of their own charters. They are referred to merely to show the trend of judicial opinion on this question. These cases are so numerous, and the doctrine they establish is so well recognized, we deem it unnecessary to cite them by name. The following language, used by Judge Dillon in his great work on Municipal Corporations, has some bearing on the question now being considered: "Whether a municipal corporation, with power to purchase and hold real estate for certain purposes, has acquired and is holding such property for other purposes, is a question which can only be determined in a proceeding instituted at the instance of the State. If there is capacity to purchase, the deed to the corporation divests the estate of the grantor, and there is a complete sale; and whether the corporation, in purchasing, exceeds its power, is a question between it and the State, and does not concern the vendor or others." 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. ed. 1890, § 574. We have been able to find some cases directly in point. In that of Barnes v. Suddard, 117 Ill. 237, 4 West. Rep. 134, it was held that, where a foreign corporation had power to acquire real estate so far as necessary for its business, its acquisition of realty cannot be assailed in a collateral proceeding as an act ultra vires. It appears from an examination of that case that in Illinois foreign corporations had the same rights to own and hold real estate as did domestic corporations of that State, and the case turned, not upon the charter powers of the corporation, but upon its right under the Illinois law to hold land. The Pennsylvania Act approved April 26, 1855, forbade any foreign corporation to acquire and hold real estate. Notwithstanding this Statute, it was held, in the case of Hickory Farm Oil Co. v.

The administrator cannot convey, and the Legislature cannot divert, property which escheats to the State. State v. Reeder, 5 Neb. 308.

No sale can be made under an escheat found, after the grant of letters of administration until the year for filing administrator's account has expired. Com. v. Weart, 12 Phila. 345.

The State in case of escheat is not to be deemed an heir within the statute requiring notice of probate to presumptive heirs. State v. Ames, 23 La. Ann. 69.

After the State has acknowledged one as heir-at-law, and released its right to him, the heir cannot proceed in the name of the State for his own benefit. State v. Engle, 21 N. J. L. 347.

If the saving in the statute in favor of creditors applies to the land held by an alien, the fact of such indebtedness would not prevent escheat, but would remain a charge upon the land to which the State succeeded. Congregational Church v. Morris, 8 Ala. 122.

Interest in property subject to escheat.

An estate held in trust may be escheated when the trust expires. Com. v. Nalle, 33 Pa. 429.

A remainder in fee dependent on a valid life estate may escheat before the death of the life tenant. So where a citizen devised a life estate in land to his wife, remainder to his nephews and nieces who were aliens, as tenants in common, the land escheated on the death of the wife though the sole surviving remainderman was naturalized before her death, the others having died aliens. People v. Conklin, 2 Hill, 67.

An interest in remainder cannot be escheated until the expiration of the life estate. The limitation begins to run only from that time. Com. v. Nalle, supra.

Stipulations in a covenant to hold land for the benefit of an alien, and to convey as he shall direct, create no interest in the land, nor right of possession. A citizen being the owner in fee, there can be no forfeiture by reason of such interest in the alien. Ludlow v. Van Ness, 8 Bosw. 173.

Lands held in partnership.

Where all the partners of a firm have died intestate and without heirs or known kindred, the property of the firm escheats to the Commonwealth; but this would not preclude the heirs or kindred of a partner from traversing the inquisition. Com. v. North American L. Co. 57 Pa. 102, 12 L. R. A.

Lands held by foreign corporations subject to escheat.

A purchase, by a foreign corporation, of the capital stock of a local corporation, as a device to enable it to hold real estate, is a violation of the Act prohibiting foreign corporations from acquiring any real estate within the Commonwealth, unless authorized by law; and lands so held are subject to escheat. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 5 Cent. Rep. 743, 114 Pa. 340.

The Act of April 15, 1890, making it lawful for railroad companies to aid corporations authorized by law to develop coal, etc., in the Commonwealth, by the purchase of their capital stock, etc., does not authorize such a purchase. Ibid.

The penalty of escheat is removed, although the Act imposing it is not repealed in terms, when, before any inquisition is taken, a statute has declared that the land should be held "indefeasibly as to any right of escheat" in the Commonwealth. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 634, 123 Pa. 591.

Title in State, when vests.

Title by escheat vests on death of owner without heirs. Sands v. Lynham, 27 Gratt. 201.

The real estate of a citizen who dies intestate without heirs vests immediately in the State. Montgomery v. Dorion, 7 N. H. 475; O'Hanlin v. Den, 20 N. J. L. 31, 21 N. J. L. 532.

Lands which escheat for want of heirs may be the subject of legislative grant before office found. Colgan v. McKeon, 24 N. J. L. 566; McCaughal v. Ryan, 27 Barb. 376.

In Texas, the fact of abandonment of land ipso facto vacates it, and no proceeding in the nature of "office found" is necessary to revest the title in the State. Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex. 373.

Where for many years nothing had been heard of the grantee of land or of any will or any heir of his, it will be presumed that the land had escheated on due inquest. Vickery v. Benson, 26 Ga. 523.

The claim of the State for taxes is merged in its ownership by escheat. Reid v. State, 74 Ind. 253.

Possession by State.

An inquisition of escheat vests possession immediately if the possession is vacant otherwise if held adversely; in such case an entry is necessary to give the government possession. Com. v. Hite, 6 Leigh, 582.

Where an alien dies leaving known devisees the

Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co., 82 Fed. Rep. 22, that a deed of conveyance of land to such a corporation was not void, but passed the title, and that the corporation held the land subject to the Commonwealth's right of escheat; also that the Commonwealth alone could object to the legal capacity of the corporation to hold real estate. In support of this opinion, Bons v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (Pa.), 5 Atl. Rep. 751, and Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Lewis, 58 Iowa, 101, are cited. Another case holding the same way is that of Carlson v. Aultman, decided by the Supreme Court of Nebraska, and reported in 28 Neb. 672. An Act of Nebraska, passed in 1887, provided that no non-resident alien foreigner, nor any corporation not incorporated by laws of that State, should acquire or own, hold or possess, any real estate in the State of Nebraska. While this law was in force, Aultman & Co., a foreign corporation, purchased land in that State at a judicial sale, and it was held that this corporation's title was valid against everyone but the State, and could be defeated only by proceedings brought by the State for that purpose. These foreign corporations, it seems, have been treated as aliens were in England as to purchasing and holding real estate. By the common law, while an alien might purchase, he could do so only for the benefit of the king, and the king was entitled to land purchased by him by virtue of his prerogative upon "office found;" and accordingly it was held that, unless the proceeding of "office found" was perfected an alien had the power to hold and convey the land inter vivos. 1 Devlin, Deeds, §§ 124, 126.

It therefore seems clear, in view of the cases cited and the common-law foundation upon which the principle governing them is based, that the doctrine is thoroughly established in our American States that the right of foreign corporations to purchase or hold lands in excess of the authority conferred, either by their State must first establish her title, before she is entitled to possession. Reid v. State, 74 Ind. 232.

Disabilities of alienage; rule in various States.

Under the Statute of Colorado nonresident aliens may own, inherit and convey property, real or personal, the same as citizens and residents. McConville v. Howell, 17 Fed. Rep. 104.

Where an alien becomes a citizen of Kentucky and dies intestate and childless, his sister, an alien and foreign resident, may take his real estate by descent subject to the rights of his widow. Eustache v. Rodaquest, 11 Bush, 42.

The Laws of Massachusetts recognize but two cases of escheat of real estate, one in case of an alien, the other in case of a citizen dying without heirs and intestate. Sewall v. Lee, 9 Mass. 368.

The Missouri Statutes remove all disabilities of alienage. An alien, therefore, may take land by descent from an alien. Burke v. Adams, 80 Mo. 504.

The law existing at the time of descent cast governs the right of aliens to inherit realty. Pilla v. German School Asso. 28 Fed. Rep. 700.

The Nevada Constitution gives to foreigners becoming bona fide residents the rights of citizens as to property, etc. State v. Preble, 18 Nev. 251.

Such a provision does not prevent extending the right of inheritance to nonresident aliens. Re Billings, 65 Cal. 592.

When it appears that a person claiming to be heir to an intestate is an alien he cannot take by descent, and no presumption can be indulged in his favor. Eitenheimer v. Heffernan, 66 Barb. 374.

The statutes which enable resident aliens to take and hold real estate in New York apply only to purchasers, or those who have a conveyance, or to whom the lands have descended or been devised. Ibid.

Land claimed by heirs-at-law of a resident alien is theirs to enjoy and hold until a forfeiture declared by the State. Until then the State cannot convey or release to a stranger. Maynard v. Maynard, 36 Hun, 227.

In New York a nonresident alien can inherit land. Re Powers, 8 Dem. 198.

Under the treaty between the United States and Wurtemberg, the alien heir for two years has precisely the same rights as a resident heir. Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun, 476.

Where an alien purchased land, and died before naturalization, the land escheated to the State, but might be vested in the widow of the alien. Rubeck v. Gardner, 7 Watts, 455.

The Tennessee Act allowing lands of an unnaturalized resident on dismissal of the suit for 12 L. R. A.

an escheat to vest in his widow, is valid. Garretson v. Brien, 2 Heisk. 534.

The Tennessee Code and the Treaty between the United States and France annul the right of escheat in the State, and a subject of France can hold and convey land as a citizen of Tennessee. Baker v. Shy, 9 Heisk. 85.

The Code embodies the common-law principle that an alien has no inheritable blood, but can hold and convey lands by will or deed, burdened with the right of escheat by the sovereign. Ibid.

The widow of an alien, who deserted her abroad, came to Tennessee and there acquired land and died, was held entitled to dower in such land. It is otherwise, however, under the Homestead Laws. Emmett v. Emmett, 14 Lea, 399.

In Texas the statute does not prohibit administration in the county court upon the estate of persons dying intestate without heirs. Hall v. Claiborne, 27 Tex. 217.

Where aliens are prohibited from acquiring real estate, a deed upon a secret trust for a foreigner, the maker having no knowledge of the trust, is not void; the trust alone is void. Hammekin v. Clayton, 2 Woods, 336.

The law in force at the death of the former owner must govern the decision between claims of aliens to inherit, and of the State to take by escheat. Hauensteins v. Lynham, 28 Gratt. 62.

A testator died without lawful issue, having devised his real estate to executors in trust to convert the same into money, the proceeds and the rents and profits of said lands to be given to his sisters, who were aliens, charged with payment of his debts, his personal estate being sufficient to pay his debts, on equal division of the court the lands were held not to escheat. Com. v. Martin, 5 Munf. 117.

Other disabilities.

A deed of bargain and sale executed by a lunatic is void, and the land escheats on failure of heirs. Destilver's Case, 5 Rawle, 111.

Where free colored persons entered on land under a deed, which because of their color was void, and remained in possession until a change in the law, their possession was good as against the claim of all except the State. Beatty v. Benton, 78 Ga. 187.

Escheated property devoted to educational purposes.

The Statute enabling children adopted under laws of another State to take and hold real estate does not contravene the constitutional provision giving own charters or by the laws of the State in which such purchase is made, can only be questioned by the State itself in which such land may be situated. It follows, of course, that the defendant in this case had no right whatever to raise the question made in the ground of this illegality hereinbefore set forth; and, that being true, the production of the deeds called for was unnecessary and useless, because the ground of illegality, in support of which it was sought to introduce these deeds, presented no legal reason for interfering with the progress of the plaintiff's execution.

2. Another ground of the illegality alleged, in effect, that the deed purporting to be from the plaintiff to the defendant in execution, which had been filed in the clerk's office, was no sufficient deed, and would not convey title out of the plaintiff to the defendant, but would only throw a cloud upon the defendant's title, and cause the land to sell for less than its true value. If these assertions are true they amount to a good ground of illegality. It may be that such ground is not set forth with sufficient clearness, but, as there was no special demurrer or objection to it, because it was wanting in distinctness or fullness, but only a general motion, in the nature of a demurrer, to dismiss the affidavit of illegality, the point was not rightly made to the court below as to the insufficiency of this ground, and the judge, therefore, properly refused to dismiss the affidavit of illegality as a whole. If this ground failed to set forth the reasons why the deed referred to was insufficient, and failed to convey title to the defendant, this distinct objection should have been made to it. We therefore leave the case to be tried again in the court below, with such additional light shed upon the law of the case as may be gathered from this opinion.

escheated lands to the school fund. State v. Meyer, 63 Ind. 33.

It is sufficient answer to aver title through such adoption and to file the record thereof. Ibid.

In Tennessee all escheated property is appropriated to common schools, to be disposed of by the school commissioners as they may deem best for the common-school fund. Hinkle v. Shadden, 2 Swan, 43; Parchman v. Charlton, 1 Coldw. 381.

A sale of escheated land under a decree of the court for the purpose of paying the debts of intestate is void unless the board of common-school commissioners is a party to the proceeding. Ibid.

A society having a right under its charter to escheated property does not forfeit or waive its right by proceeding through the state escheator rather than by one appointed by itself. Nettles v. Cummings, 9 Rich. Eq. 440.

Notice of an application to release escheated lands should be given to bona fide purchasers of lands under mortgage foreclosure, or they will not be bound by the release. Bradley v. Dwight, 63 How. Pr. 300.

Trustees of escheated property "may sell or otherwise dispose of the land or property as they may deem for the best interest of the State." Crane v. Reeder, 23 Mich. 322.

Escheated lands, how acquired.

Lands that escheat cannot be regranted as vacant land, but must be sold pursuant to statute. Bodden v. Speigner, 2 Brev. (S. C.) 321.

Escheated lands are not subject to location as vacant lands, nor will a junior patent for such lands held by another be ended by proceeding for an escheat. Hughes v. State, 41 Tex. 10.

Officers of the land office have no authority to issue warrants for taking up escheated lands. They are to be sold at auction after seven years from the inquisition. Straub v. Dimm, 37 Pa. 36.

Land which has escheated can be taken up only under an escheat warrant, but one who in good faith has paid for lands supposed to be vacant will be protected against a subsequent grant issued to another upon an escheat warrant. Armstrong v. Bittinger, 47 Md. 103.

The warrant issued on application for a patent of escheated lands should state that the owner of the land died seized in fee intestate and without heirs. Ibid.

An escheat grant passes all the land in its true location, but not where it clearly appears that it was not intended to include it all, and the taker of the escheat warrant knew that it did not. Jones v. Bradley, 4 Md. Ch. 167.

An escheat patent is prima facie evidence of an escheat at the date of a warrant. Peterkin v. Inloes, 4 Md. 173.

Statutes relating to escheats.

The law regulating escheats on civil grounds is not within the prohibitory clause of the United States Constitution concerning ex post facto laws. White v. Wayne, T. U. P. Charl. (Ga.) 94.

Under the Act of 1801, the property of an intestate remains in hands of the administrator, and his rights can only be devested by verdict of the jury. Carnochan v. Abrahams, R. M. Charl. (Ga.) 813.

A statute passed pending proceedings by the escheator, that property of an illegitimate should go to his legitimate half brothers, is good. Gresham v. Rickenbacher, 28 Ga. 237.

Where during pendency of the action the State passed an Act relinquishing the land to occupants, the Act was constitutional. State v. Tilghman, 14 Iowa, 474.

The Statute of Rhode Island, providing that real estate of an alien dying thereafter shall be transmitted to his heirs, does not affect a bill filed prior to its passage; in such case the estate of the alien escheats. Haigh v. Haigh, 9 R. I. 26.

Provisions of the Code requiring clerks of courts to pay over moneys which have remained in their offices for a specified time to the county treasury are based upon the doctrine of escheat, and are constitutional. Deaderick v. Washington County, Ct. 1 Coldw. 202.

Where the Constitution gives power to the Legislature to provide methods by which forfeiture may be enforced, until the Legislature acts, there can be no proceedings. Wederanders v. State, 64 Tex. 133.

Requiring the comptroller to take charge of all escheated property and to account for its proceeds is in conflict with the authority conferred by statute upon the district court to order the sale of escheated property. Hughes v. State, 41 Tex. 10.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI INCLINED PLANE R. CO.,
Pf. in Err.,

v.
 CITY & SUBURBAN TELEGRAPH
 ASSOCIATION.

(....Ohio St....)

*1. The dominant purpose for which streets in a municipality are dedicated and opened is to facilitate public travel and transportation, and in that view, new and improved modes of conveyance by street railways are by law authorized to be constructed, and a franchise granted to a telephone company of constructing and operating its lines along and upon such streets, is subordinate to the rights of the public in the streets for the purpose of travel and transportation.

2. The fact that a telephone company acquired and entered upon the exercise of a franchise to erect and maintain its telephone poles and wires upon the streets of a city, prior to the operation of an electric railway thereon, will not give the telephone company, in the use of the streets, a right paramount to the easement of the public to adopt and use the best and most approved mode of travel thereon; and if the operation of the street railway by electricity as the motive power tends to disturb the working of the telephone system, the remedy of the telephone company will be, to re-adjust its methods to meet the condition created by the introduction of electro-motive power upon the street railway.

3. Where a telephone company, under authority derived from the Statute, places its poles and wires in the streets of a municipality, and in order to make a complete electric circuit for the transmission of telephonic messages, uses the earth, or what is known as the "ground circuit," for a return current of electricity; and where an electric street railway, afterwards constructed upon the same streets, is operated with the "Single Trolley Overhead System"—so-called—of which the ground circuit is a constituent part, if the use of the ground circuit in the operation of the street railway interferes with telephone communication, the telephone company, as against the street railway, will not have a vested interest and exclusive right in and to the use of the ground circuit as a part of the telephone system.

ERROR to General Term of the Superior Court of Cincinnati to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendant from operating its cars by electricity in such a way as to interfere with plaintiff's business. Reversed.

Statement by Dickman, J.:

The original action was commenced in the Superior Court of Cincinnati, by the City and Suburban Telegraph Association, defendant in error, against the Cincinnati Inclined Plane Railway Company, plaintiff in error.

The petition filed was as follows:

"The plaintiff says that it is an association incorporated under the laws of Ohio, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating telegraph and telephone lines in said State and elsewhere, and has its principal office and business in the City of Cincinnati, where it is now, and has for more than ten years past been, conducting a telephone business, by means of wires stretched upon poles lawfully placed and maintained in the streets pursuant to the statutes made for that purpose, and under the direction of the authorities of said city.

"Said wires are connected with and terminate at the several 'exchanges' owned by the plaintiff in said city and vicinity.

"At the 'exchanges' the wires are so arranged, by means of a device for that purpose, that any one of them can be immediately connected with any other. Each wire also terminates in the office, store, room, place of business or residence of some person, firm or company—a subscriber to this Association paying an annual sum for the use of the telephone and the service in connection therewith. Each of such subscribers can, by the use of the telephone and other patented inventions of which the plaintiff is the sole licensee in the territory where it transacts business, immediately communicate with and speak to an operator in an 'exchange', and said operator can, and if requested does, forthwith connect such subscriber's wire with that of any other subscriber named, so that the two may converse directly with each other.

"Such communication is effected by means of a slight but continuous electric current passing over the wire from the speaker to the hearer, and, unless interrupted or interfered with, is easily and quickly made.

"Plaintiff says that many thousand such communications are daily made between persons in all parts of said city and in the County of Hamilton; that all the principal public offices, business houses, newspaper offices, hotels and other places of resort, and many residences in said county, are thus connected together and brought into communication.

"Plaintiff says that it has over 8,000 such subscribers in the city and vicinity, that its lines also extend to and connect all the villages for many miles around said city, and hundreds of communications are daily made over the last-named lines, for each of which a small sum is paid plaintiff by the person sending the same; that the whole constitutes a business of value to the plaintiff and important to the public.

"Plaintiff further says that the defendant is a corporation under the laws of Ohio, engaged in the maintenance and operation of an inclined-plane railway in the City of Cincinnati, and claims to own, and is now in possession of, the street railway tracks of what is generally known as the Mt. Auburn Street Railway, which, beginning at the corner of Fifth and Walnut Streets in said city, extends thence, by single track, on Fifth to Main Street, thence on Main, by single track, to Court Street, thence on Main, by double track, to Mulberry Street, where it connects with said Inclined Plane Railway; also, extending from the north end of said Inclined Plane Railway, by double track, on Locust and Mason Streets, Auburn Avenue and Vine Street to the Carthage Turnpike and Zoological Garden; also, on Court Street, by single track, from Main to Walnut Street, and on Walnut Street, by single track, to Fifth Street to place of beginning.

"Plaintiff further says that said defendant claims to own and control said track by virtue of an assignment or transfer of the same from other parties or companies; but plaintiff is not informed as to said transfers, or the validity thereof, and does not admit that the same or any of them are lawful or valid.

"But plaintiff says that the said tracks were originally constructed by the parties under whom defendant claims under alleged grants from the City of Cincinnati, which provided that 'no motive power, except horses or mules, shall be used on said tracks,' and the same have never been altered or amended in that respect, and the defendant has never acquired from the State of Ohio or the City of Cincinnati any right to erect and maintain poles or wires in the streets aforesaid, or to use electricity as a motive power for its cars.

"Plaintiff further says that since the defendant came into possession of said Street Railway, it has, within six months last past, and without any lawful authority so to do, caused a line of iron poles to be erected on each side of all the streets where said tracks are situated as aforesaid, and placed upon the said poles large wires which it keeps constantly charged with powerful currents of electricity, generated by large steam engines and dynamos owned and operated by defendant for that purpose, by means whereof the cars upon all parts of the track aforesaid are run and operated from six o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock at night of each and every day.

"Plaintiff further says that the defendant claims to have secured authority from the commissioners of Hamilton County to extend tracks along and upon the Carthage Turnpike, to be operated by electricity as aforesaid, from the existing tracks to the Village of Carthage, and will place thereon poles and wires, and unless restrained by the order of this court will proceed to run and operate street-cars thereon in the same manner that it is now running and operating them upon existing tracks.

"Plaintiff further says that ever since defendant commenced the operation of its cars by electricity, it has caused, and is still causing, great damage and injury to plaintiff by creating electric currents and noise upon plaintiff's telephone wires, many of which are, and have been, for a period long prior to the use of electricity by defendant, located upon each and all the streets aforesaid and upon the Carthage Turnpike. By reason of the proximity of the defendant's poles and wires to those of plaintiff, and of the powerful currents used by defendant, together with its mode of use and manner of construction, currents of electricity are transmitted to or inducted upon the wires of plaintiff such as to render them useless for telephonic purposes.

"The noises produced by defendant's operations are loud and continuous, so as to prevent communication by telephone, and the connection of many of plaintiff's subscribers with the exchanges and with each other has been thereby interrupted and broken up, and some of said subscribers have ordered their telephones removed and canceled subscriptions, while others have only been restrained from so doing by the representations of plaintiff's officers that steps would be taken to induce or compel defendant to remedy the evil.

"Plaintiff has received and is receiving a multitude of complaints from subscribers whose lines are affected by defendant's operation, and numerous notices that unless the difficulty is remedied, the telephones of the complaining subscribers must be removed.

"Plaintiff further says that as soon as the defendant began the operation of cars by electricity, and the consequent injury to its, plaintiff's, plant and business, defendant was notified thereof and requested to remedy the same, and has since been repeatedly urged to do so, but up to the present time has failed and refused to apply, or attempt to apply, any remedy, or take any step, to prevent the injury to plaintiff aforesaid, which plaintiff is informed and believes can be done by defendant without any great expenditure of money, and without giving up the use of electricity as a motive power for its cars.

"Plaintiff asserts that great injury has been caused, and great and irreparable injury will be caused, to it by the continued operation of cars by defendant, as it now and has been heretofore operating the same.

"The plaintiff's lines and telephones in the vicinity of said street railway will be rendered useless, the revenue received from the subscribers thereof cut off, and the business of the Company greatly reduced.

"Wherefore, the plaintiff prays that defendant be temporarily enjoined from constructing and operating an electric railway on the Carthage Turnpike, of the sort that it is now using, or of any sort that will interfere with or injure plaintiff's lines or business. That on final hearing said injunction be made perpetual, and the defendant further restrained from operating any of its cars by means of electricity in the manner it is now operating the same, or in any manner that may interfere with or injure plaintiff's business.

"That the damages already suffered by the plaintiff be assessed and ordered paid by defendant, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case and equity may require."

To this petition the defendant filed an answer, in which, among its averments and denials, the defendant denies that the plaintiff is an association incorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating telephone lines in said State; and denies that the plaintiff's telephone poles and telephone wires are lawfully maintained in the streets and highways pursuant to the statutes made for that purpose, or under the direction of the authorities of the City of Cincinnati, and alleges that the plaintiff exercises the powers of a telephone company and maintains its poles and wires without any lawful authority whatever.

The answer avers that under and by reason of the ordinances, grants, laws, lease and resolutions therein mentioned, it rightfully and lawfully maintains, controls and operates by the electric system, known as the "Sprague Single Trolley Overhead System," all its lines of road described in the plaintiff's petition.

"The defendant, answering, says, that it is not liable to the plaintiff in any form of action, whether in law or equity, for the alleged interferences and disturbances as set forth in the petition; and denies that there is anything in any of the laws of the State, or in any pretended grant to the plaintiff, which gives to the plaintiff the right to use the earth at all, much less the exclusive right to use the earth for its return circuit; on the contrary, the defendant denies that the authorities which made any pretended grant to the plaintiff knew that the plaintiff intended to use the earth at all for its return circuit, or would so construct its lines; and further denies the claim set up by the petition to the exclusive use of the earth by the plaintiff, because of the vagueness of said claim.

"The defendant, further answering, says that the plaintiff, if undisturbed by the electrical current from the dynamos of the defendant, will be compelled to resort to other than a grounded circuit in order to give efficient service to its patrons; that the uniform and slight current which the plaintiff claims to be necessary to the successful operation of the telephone cannot be obtained by the use of the ground circuit, but may be obtained by constructing the telephone either with a complete metallic circuit, or by resort to what is known as the McCluer device; that whereas, instead of being injured by abandoning the ground circuit and resorting to the metallic circuit or the McCluer device, the plaintiff will be actually benefited in its service to its patrons; the defendant cannot abandon its use of the ground circuit without injury to its railroad and to its patrons; that the defendant could not alter its plan of electrical propulsion so as to have a metallic circuit—that such a change is impracticable, would involve a very large outlay, necessitate an overhead structure of double or treble cost of that now used, and very unsightly, and after it is constructed it would not be successful; that such a system has been tried and found to be a financial and commercial failure, and in its effect as annoying and disturbing as the Sprague system, under which the defendant is now operating.

"The defendant, further answering, denies that the noises produced by its operations are loud and continuous so as to prevent communication by telephone, and that the connection of many of the plaintiff's subscribers with the exchange, and with each other, had been thereby interrupted and broken up. It denies that the plaintiff has received and is receiving a multitude of complaints from subscribers whose lines are affected by defendant's operations, and also numerous notices that unless the difficulty is remedied the telephones of the complaining subscribers must be removed.

"It denies that great injury has been caused, and great and irreparable injury will be caused, to the plaintiff by the continued operation of cars by defendant as it is now and has been heretofore operating the same. It denies that the plaintiff's lines and telephones in the vicinity of said Street Railway will be rendered useless, the revenue received from the subscribers therefor cut off, and the business of the plaintiff greatly reduced."

The plaintiff, for reply, denies each and every allegation contained in the answer, except such as admitted allegations of the petition.

The action came on to be heard at a special term of the court, held in February, 1890, and neither party demanding a jury, the cause was heard and tried by the court upon the pleadings and evidence; and thereupon the court made a finding of facts, and stated its conclusion of law upon the facts so found, and rendered a judgment and decree thereon in favor of the Telegraph Association against the Railway Company, as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard upon the pleadings and the evidence, and having been fully argued by counsel and submitted to the court without intervention of a jury, the court, upon consideration thereof, finds that plaintiff lawfully maintains telephone lines upon the streets named in the petition and upon the Carthage Turnpike, and had so maintained the same ever since a time long prior to the introduction of electro-motive power upon the street railway of defendant, and that said telephone lines are maintained and operated in the manner set forth in the petition; that defendant began the operation of cars by means of electro-motive power upon the Street Railway on the—day of June, 1889, and by reason thereof, and especially of the manner in which the electric current is permitted to pass from the wheels of defendant's cars into the rails and thence into the earth, great injury has been and continues to be inflicted upon the plaintiff in the manner described in the petition, and that great and irreparable injury will be inflicted upon the plaintiff by the continued operation of defendant's cars, in the manner in which they are now operated, and will continue to be operated, unless restrained by the order of this court, and that plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law for said injury.

"The court further finds that there is a mode of operating street-cars by electro-motive power by means of the double trolley, available to the defendant, the use of which will avoid and prevent the injury to the plaintiff above mentioned.

"As matter of law, the court concludes that defendant is bound to adopt some mode of propelling its cars other than the one which inflicts the said injury upon the plaintiff, to which finding and decision of the court the defendant excepted at the time the same was made, and moved the court to set the same aside and grant it a new trial:

"1. Because the finding and decision of the court is not sustained by sufficient evidence, but is against the weight of the same.

"2. Because the finding and decision of the court is contrary to law.

"Which said motion the court overruled, to which ruling the defendant at the time the same was made excepted and presented to the court its bill of exceptions herein (embodying all the testimony, evidence and exhibits offered by either party upon the trial of the action), which, being found by the court to be true, is allowed and signed, and on motion is hereby made part of the record of the case, and thereupon the court orders, adjudge and decrees that the said defendant Company be and it is hereby perpetually restrained and enjoined from operating any car or cars upon the street-railway track mentioned in the petition, or any of them, or upon any tracks laid or to be laid upon Carthage Turnpike, by means of electric currents passing from a wheel or wheels of such car or cars into the rails of such track or any of them, or by means of electric currents, the whole or any part of which may be knowingly permitted to pass into the earth, or for which the earth constitutes any part of the conducting medium in such manner as to cause injury to the plaintiff, to all of which the defendant excepts. It is further ordered that the operation of this decree be and it is hereby stayed for the period of six months from date hereof, with liberty upon the part of the defendant to apply for an extension of said time."

The court appointed a special master, with directions that he ascertain and report the amount of damage, in money, theretofore sustained by the Telegraph Association, and hear evidence for that purpose, and report to the court.

Upon petition in error, the superior court, at general term, affirmed the judgment and decree of the court at special term. By the present proceeding in error, this court is asked by the Railway Company to reverse the judgment of the superior court at general term, and to render such judgment as the court below should have rendered.

Further facts disclosed by the record, and undisputed, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John S. Wise, with Messrs. E. A. Ferguson and R. A. Harrison, for plaintiff in error:

In 1871 defendant was incorporated and admitted into the streets of Cincinnati as a street railway. In 1877, the board of public works was empowered to authorize a change of its motive power at any time. This was notice to the world, before the discovery of the telephone, that the Railroad Company might, whenever it chose, stop the use of horses and use any propulsive agency, then or thereafter in lawful use as a motive power, for street railways in Cincinnati.

Under sanction of the Board of Public Works of Cincinnati, granted in 1886, the Railway Company proceeded to use a single-trolley electric railway, as described in the bill and proceedings.

In Ohio, street railways enjoy the easement of the public highway for purposes of public travel, in the strict line of the original objects for which the public highway was dedicated.

Electric railways are nothing but an improvement upon street railways propelled by horses, or other antecedent motive power; and occupy the highways with exactly the same rights as were enjoyed by street railways so propelled, before electric propulsion was resorted to.

The public highways were not originally dedicated for the purposes of telegraph and telephone poles.

The law under which the telegraph companies are organized grants them no co-ordinate rights with travelers upon the public highway, but assigns them to a secondary and subordinate position. They are not upon the highway by virtue of rights acquired under its original dedication; their presence upon, and use of, the highway, is an additional burden upon the highway.

Even if, in the enjoyment of a common right of user of the highway, a user in which both plaintiff and defendant in error are of equal dignity, the plaintiff in error has been guilty of a violation of the defendant in error's rights, the way to redress those rights is not by an injunction.

Heerman v. Beef Slough Mfg. B. L. D. & Transp. Co. 8 Biss. 824.

The hardship and injury caused to plaintiff in error and to the public by granting the injunction is greater than the mischief to defendant in error which the injunction is intended to remedy.

Wood v. Sutcliffe, 2 Sim. N. S. 168, 16 Jur. 75, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 217.

Messrs. Aaron F. Perry, Peck & Shaffer and Selwyn N. Owen, for defendant in error.

Dickman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Cincinnati Inclined Plane Railway Company was incorporated in the year 1871, under the Act of May 1, 1853, entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Creation and Regulation of Incorporated Companies in the State of Ohio." On March 30, 1877, the Legislature passed an Act authorizing any inclined-plane railway or railroad company theretofore or thereafter organized under the Act of 1853, to hold, lease or purchase, and maintain and operate such portion of any street railroad leading to or connected with the inclined plane as might be necessary for the convenient dispatch of its business, upon the same terms and conditions on which it held, maintained and operated its inclined plane; "provided, that no other motive power than animals shall be used on the public highways occupied by such street-railway company without the consent of the board of public works in any city having such board, and the common council, or the public authority or company having charge, or owning any other highway in which such street railroad may be laid."

In September, 1885, the Cincinnati board of public works adopted a resolution, consenting "to the use either of electricity, cable or compressed air, as a motive power by the Cincinnati Inclined Plane Railway Company upon the highways in which the street railroads, connected with its inclined plane, and held and operated by it, are laid."

In October, 1888, the Railway Company, setting forth the resolution giving such consent, and stating that it had decided to use electricity as a motive power on its road, made application to the board of public affairs—the legally constituted successor of the board of public works—for permission to erect along the entire length of its road the poles, wires and other appliances necessary to operate and maintain its entire line from Fifth and Walnut Streets to the zoological garden, as an electric road.

And thereupon, the board of public affairs, acting under authority of the Act of March 30, 1877, and in furtherance of the grant made by the board of public works, granted the application of the Railway Company, upon the following conditions:

"1. The poles to be made of iron of the size and pattern, and the wires to be strung in the manner as shown on the plan submitted to this board, and hereby approved."

In February, 1889, in accordance with the provisions of section 8306, of the Revised Statutes, the stockholders of the Railway Company extended the northern terminus of its road at the zoological garden to the Village of Glendale. And in March, 1889, the board of county commissioners of Hamilton County, by resolution, granted the application of the Railway Company to use and occupy the Carthage Turnpike, to its northern terminus, by double tracks, and with necessary appendages and appurtenances of an overhead electric railroad system, so as to enable the Company to permit continuous, rapid and safe transportation between Fountain Square in Cincinnati and the Village of Carthage. A provision in the grant provided for the removal by the county commissioners of any and all telegraph and telephone poles which might interfere with the operation of the electric road. This provision, however, was afterwards modified by the action of the commissioners, so as to locate the telegraph and telephone poles at the curb line.

The plan submitted to and approved by the board of public affairs is known as the "Sprague Single Trolley Overhead System." Under the supervision of the engineer of the board, the poles were erected and wires strung; and about the beginning of June, 1889, the Railway Company had put its street railway in operation under that system, as far as the zoological garden; and at the commencement of the original action, was engaged in constructing its extension along the Carthage Turnpike under the grant of the county commissioners, with the necessary appendages and appurtenances of the single-trolley system.

In the Sprague system, the electricity used to operate the motors under the cars is conveyed to them by a single overhead trolley wire, and a single arm or pole attached to the car and carrying a contact wheel which runs along and passes up underneath the trolley wire. The current passes down the pole or arm to the switch apparatus on board the car, through the motors, thence to the wheels and to the tracks. It then passes back to the station along the iron rails of the track interlaced together by conducting wires, and finally connected by a conducting wire with the negative pole of the dynamo, the greater portion of the current flowing along this line of the track as the return current. Some portions of such current, however, are unavoidably diverted through whatever conductors are in proximity, and which themselves have grounded circuits, but generally returning to the source in which it originated, by means of the metallic ground connection of the rails, as extended by the wire to the dynamo. The single-trolley system is in use on nine tenths of the railroads in the United States using electricity. As compared with the double-trolley method, it is deemed more simple, less liable to disarrangement, much cheaper and not liable to accidents which would blockade the cars. It has proved successful, and its general adoption, with full knowledge of the double-trolley method, furnishes strong proof that it is the most approved system. And in the findings of facts by the court at general term, there is nothing in disparagement of the single-trolley system in itself, but it is held objectionable because it includes the grounded circuit, which the defendant in error has adopted, and claims a monopoly of its use as against the Railway Company, as an essential part of its telephonic system.

It is evident, therefore that the Railway Company derived from the Legislature the right to use on its road other motive power than animals; that it acquired the franchise of using electro-motive power; and eliminating from view the Telegraph Association, it is making lawful use of such franchise, in a manner authorized by the statute.

The City & Suburban Telegraph Association was incorporated July 1, 1878, as a telegraph company, with lines extending from Cincinnati to Hamilton, in Butler County, under laws since embodied in the chapter of the Revised Statutes regulating "Magnetic Telegraph Companies," and containing section 8454, which provides: "A magnetic telegraph company heretofore or hereafter created may construct telegraph lines, from point to point, along and upon any public road, by the erection of the necessary fixtures, including posts, piers and abutments necessary for the wires; but the same shall not incommode the public in the use of such road."

In 1878 the Telegraph Association became the licensee of the American Bell Telephone Company, with the exclusive right to use all its patents in Cincinnati and certain territory adjacent thereto, and although organized as a telegraph company, entered upon the business of a telephone company. After obtaining the license to use the telephone, the Telegraph Association erected poles and wires upon the streets wherein the railway of the plaintiff in error is situated, and which was then being operated as a horse railway. These poles and wires were mainly erected in the years 1881 and 1882. But prior thereto, in 1880, the following section was added to the Telegraph Law: "Section 8471. The provisions of this chapter shall apply also to any company organized to construct any line or lines of telephone; and every such company shall have the same powers and be subject to the same restrictions as are therein prescribed for magnetic telegraph companies. But without this section making the provisions of the chapter relating to telegraph companies expressly applicable to telephone companies, we think that the term "telegraph," as a mode of transmitting messages or other communications, is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the telephone.

It is thus apparent that while the Telegraph Association was organized after the incorporation of the Railway Company, it had planted its poles, and strung its wires, and entered upon the business of a telephone company before the Railway Company had put its street railway into operation, with electricity as the motive power; that permission, in due form of law, was granted to the Telegraph Association to place and maintain its poles and wires for the purpose of supplying telephonic communication to its subscribers in Cincinnati and vicinity, and also as a means of communication for its longer lines.

But it is urged that the franchise of the Telegraph Association to construct lines of telephone is greatly impaired by reason of the single-trolley railway using a grounded circuit, whereby a large part of the electric current flows off from the rails to the surrounding earth, and to and upon all telephone wires which may be connected with the earth in proximity to the railway. The action is described as conduction, causing more or less of electric current to be poured into the earth and into all electric conductors connected with the earth, thereby reaching telephone wires in a grounded circuit, and creating loud and continuous noises upon the wires, which disturb telephonic communication. This disturbance, however, results not solely from the earth circuit of the Railway Company, but also from the fact that the defendant in error likewise relies upon the earth for its return circuit, by connecting with the earth the end of its wire furthest from its electric batteries. The telephone wires are carried from the phones of subscribers to the gas pipes in the rooms where the phones are located, or to water pipes, or to the earth, in order to make a complete circuit. The interference moreover, with the operation of the telephone is said to be largely attributable to the delicate mechanism of the telephone wires and phones. The wires, being designed to carry the extremely small current needed for telephone transmission, are too small in size to carry successfully the strong current passing into them from electric railways.

It is claimed that in addition to this conduction or leakage disturbance, the single-trolley electric railway introduces serious disturbances on telephone lines by induction, for the reason that such electric railways employ large wires to convey the current used for the propulsion of their cars, and this current is constantly and rapidly changing its strength; that these rapidly changing currents in the electric railway wires induce disturbing currents in parallel telephone wires near which the electric railways have been built, and thus prevent a successful transmission of telephonic messages. These interferences with the telephone service may be obviated, it is stated, by the railway company giving up the single-trolley system with the ground circuit, and substituting the double-trolley system with its two trolley wires, two trolley wheels, and electric current passing from one wire through one trolley, through the motor, back through the other trolley to the other wire, and so back to the generator, without escaping to the earth. The grounded circuit, it is insisted, should be abandoned and surrendered to the sole use and service of the defendant in error. But it is admitted that other remedies of the telephone disturbances may be easily obtained by constructing the telephone with a complete metallic circuit, or by resort to what is known as the McCluer device, consisting of a single return wire, to which a number of telephone wires are attached.

Conceding that the mode adopted by the Railway Company of propelling its cars by electricity is an interruption to the telephone service of the defendant in error, and calculated to impair its franchise in the manner contended, the inquiry is suggested, whether the Railway Company must yield up a useful franchise that the same may be exclusively enjoyed by the Telegraph Association, or whether the Association shall adapt its system to existing conditions; whether the Company shall change from the single to the double trolley system, from the grounded to the metallic circuit, or whether the Association shall use either a complete metallic circuit, or resort to the McCluer device. It is immaterial on which party the expense of the change may fall the more heavily. It is a question of legal right, and as remarked by Lord Hatherly, L. C., in Atty. Gen. v. Colney H. L. Asylum, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 158, "the simplest course, as far as regards the administration of justice, is to ascertain the exact state of the law which regulates the relations of the parties; and, having done so, to proceed to act on it, without any reference to the difficulties of the case on the part of those against whom it is obliged to decide; leaving those parties to relieve themselves as they best can from the position in which they have placed themselves, and if there be no other mode of escape, to cease to do the acts which occasion the wrong."

When the Telegraph Association erected its poles and lines in 1881 and 1882, with the design of conducting the business of a telephone company, it found the Railway Company operating its street railway, with authority under the Statute to use other motive power than animals, to wit, electricity, cable or compressed air, upon obtaining the consent of the board of public works. The telephone business was not among the probabilities when the streets of Cincinnati, now made use of by the Telegraph Association, were dedicated or condemned for the public use. The primary and dominant purpose of their establishment was to facilitate travel and transportation; they belong from side to side and end to end to the public, that the public may enjoy the right of traveling and transporting their goods over them. The telephone poles and wires and other appliances are not among the original and primary objects for which streets are opened; for they may be placed elsewhere than on the highways, and yet accomplish their purpose.

In Taggart v. Newport St. R. Co., 16 R. I. 668, 7 L. R. A. 205, it was said by Durfee, Ch. J., that telephone poles and wires are not used to facilitate the use of the streets for travel and transportation; "whereas the poles and wires of the railway company are directly ancillary to the use of the streets as such, in that they communicate the power by which the street-cars are propelled." As a general rule, an occupation of the streets otherwise than for travel and transportation is presumptively inferior and subservient to the dominant easement of the public for highway purposes, for, if not so, the primary object of their dedication or appropriation might be largely defeated. And the fact that permission is granted to occupy the streets or highways for a purpose other than travel does not confer a prior and paramount right to occupy them to the exclusion of their use for travel in a mode different from what obtained when such permission was given.

The main purpose of streets or highways being to facilitate travel and transportation, new and improved agencies for effecting that purpose must be presumed to have been in contemplation, in addition to those in existence when the ways were established. To those improved agencies, devised for the convenience and advantage of the community in general, the franchise of the Telephone Company to occupy the streets for carrying on its business must be secondary and subordinate. "The use of a highway for the purpose of a street railway, involves the application of new appliances and modes of travel, rather than of any new principle. In both, a corporation is employed and invested with rights in the highways; in both, an expenditure of money is required to put the road in a condition for use and to keep it in repair; but in both, the great leading object and public benefit is the accommodation of travelers who may have occasion to use them at fixed tolls or rates of fare, and not the profit of the proprietors." Ranney, J., in Cincinnati & S. G. A. St. R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523, 545.

In the case Hudson River Teleph. Co. v. Wateriset Turnp. & R. Co., 121 N. Y. 897, the right of the telephone company to enjoin the railroad company from operating its road by electricity under the single-trolley system incidentally came under consideration. In delivering the opinion of the court, Andrews, J., after stating that the use of a grounded circuit is not necessary to a telephone system, and that the substitution of the metallic for the earth circuit, besides obviating the disturbance caused by the defendant's road, would promote the general efficiency of the telephone service, says: "The plaintiff is but one of a large number of telephone companies which, under the general permission of the Statute for the incorporation of telegraph companies, have erected poles and strung their wires in the streets of the cities and villages of the State. The claim that under this permissive grant they can exclude the use of the streets by electric railways, or for other street purposes requiring the use of electricity, wherever the use of this agent interferes with the use of the telephone, although the municipality may consent and the public interest will be promoted by the other uses to which the streets are sought to be subjected, needs but to be stated to induce hesitation." In the last-entitled case, the telephone company erected poles for its wires, and perfected its system of telephone communication, several years before the railroad company substituted electricity in place of horse-power for the movement of its cars.

The authority given by the Statute to a telephone company to construct its lines from point to point, along and upon any public road, under the continuing prohibition that, "the same shall not incommode the public in the use of such road," would plainly indicate an intention on the part of the Legislature that the company shall exercise such franchise with reference to the comfort and convenience of the traveling public, and shall not in any manner abridge or impair the use by the public of the most approved methods of travel and transportation. And a reasonable interpretation of the Statute would lead to the conclusion that to impair the public enjoyment of an approved method of conveyance on the streets would be in derogation of the statutory prohibition that the public shall not be incommoded in the use of the roads and highways.

The statutory permission to the Telegraph Association to construct its telephone lines along and upon the highways was not, therefore, without qualification. But whether the Legislature had or had not imposed the condition that the public should not be incommoded, the Association, in our judgment, acquired its privilege or permissive grant, subject to the duty of so changing and adjusting, when necessary, its system of operating its telephone lines, as not to curtail the enjoyment by the public of the best modes of travel and transportation upon the streets. Whether all who go upon the streets shall have the most convenient and expeditious passage and carriage of person and goods, has not been made dependent upon the manner in which the defendant in error has preferred to locate its poles, stretch its telephone wires or form the electric circuit.

It is in recognition and maintenance of the superior easement of the public in the streets, that city councils are required to "cause the same to be kept open and in repair, and free from nuisance;" that the streets are graded and paved, and proper regulations of police provided to govern the actions of persons using them; that the abutting owner, though having a peculiar interest and easement in the adjacent street, appendant to his lot, has no right to place permanent obstructions in the street, nor do any act on his own land outside the limits of the street, that will make the way inconvenient or hazardous, or less secure than it was left by the municipal authorities. Crawford v. Delaware, 7 Ohio St. 459; Elliot, Roads and Streets, 811; Mallory v. Griffey, 85 Pa. 275; Milburn v. Fowler, 27 Hun, 568; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 1082, and cases there cited. In Ree v. Russell, 6 East, 427, the right of the owner to load and unload his wagons in the highway before his warehouse was held to be entirely subordinate to the right of public passage, and must not be exercised in such a manner as unreasonably to abridge or incommode the latter right. The court says: "The primary object of the street was for the free passage of the public, and anything which impeded that free passage, without necessity, was a nuisance. If the nature of the defendant's business were such as to require the loading and unloading of so many more of his wagons than could conveniently be contained within his own private premises, he must either enlarge his premises, or remove his business to some more convenient spot." As against the public easement in the highway, a telephone company that obtains the naked permission to locate its poles and wires along the streets should, we think, stand on no higher vantage ground than the owners of property abutting on the streets, who hold or acquire their property subject to all the consequences which may result, advantageously or otherwise, from any public and authorized use of the streets, in any mode promotive of, and consistent with, the purposes of establishing them as common highways.

This paramount easement or estate which the public acquires in the streets, carrying with it a special interest in the adoption of the most approved systems of modern street travel, cannot be made subservient to the telegraph or telephone when admitted on the highway, without the clearest expression of the legislative will. In Hickok v. Hine, 28 Ohio St. 528, it was held that where the Legislature has power to require one public easement to yield to another more important—a fortiori, where the other is inferior—the intention to grant such power must appear by express words or by necessary implication; and such implication arises only when requisite to the enjoyment of the powers expressly granted, and can be extended no further than such necessity requires. We fail to discover any authority, either express or implied, to subordinate the public easement in the streets to the privileges exercised thereon by the Telegraph Association, under the general terms of the Statute, permitting the erection of posts, piers and abutments necessary for its telephone wires, and especially when coupled with the condition that the same shall not incommode the public in the use of the highway. The demand made by the Telegraph Association is, not that the Railway Company shall so modify its existing electrical apparatus as not to interfere with the telephone service, but shall forever abandon the use of an essential part of its electro-motive system, or be perpetually enjoined. In other words, the Association claims the exclusive use of the grounded circuit, inasmuch as the mechanism of the telephone is so complex, and the electric currents employed so delicate and sensitive, that they cannot be used without disturbance from the heavier currents employed by neighboring electrical enterprises that operate with the grounded circuit. We find no foundation for such an exclusive franchise or right. When the Telegraph Association began its operations under the telephone system, neither the statute authorizing it to erect and maintain poles, wires and other necessary fixtures, nor the ordinance under which it obtained the power to extend its lines in the streets, gave an exclusive right either to use the earth for a return circuit, or a complete metallic circuit formed by double wires. The Legislature did not grant the right by general enactment, nor was the municipal corporation empowered by the Legislature to give the Telegraph Association the exclusive right to make use of its streets so as to create a monopoly. In State v. Cincinnati G. L. & C. Co., 18 Ohio St. 262, it was held that a municipal corporation cannot, without clear legislative authority, grant an exclusive right to the use of the streets for certain purposes to an individual or corporation. To enable it to grant such an exclusive right by ordinance in the nature of a contract, the power must be shown to have been expressly granted, or to be so far necessary to the proper execution of the powers which are expressly granted, as to make its existence free from doubt.

In the year 1838, Professor Steinheil made the important discovery of the practicability of using the earth as one half, or the returning section of an electric circuit. Professor Morse claimed to have made the discovery about the same time, but he failed to obtain a patent therefor. It was the discovery of an elementary principle of science, of a truth in physics, of a law in the operation of the forces of nature, and was not bounded by the trammels of the Patent Law. For forty years before the telephone was discovered, the use of the earth as a conducting medium in the formation of an electric circuit had been the common property of any electric enterprise. By what grant or title then did it become the especial, peculiar and exclusive franchise of the Telegraph Association? As it did not originate in legislative or municipal grant, so, such exclusive franchise did not spring from priority in its exercise. Where a right is common and universal, and capable of being exercised by all at the same time, there is no applicability of the rule that he who in its enjoyment is prior in point of time is prior in right. He who is first in the field does not thereby gain a monopoly of use.

It is contended, however, that the defendant in error, by virtue of its grants, acquired, before the Railway Company had a right to use electricity as a motive power, a vested interest in the telephone system as it now operates it, with a grounded circuit, and that not even the Legislature of the State could take away from it or injure this franchise, or the faith of which it has expended its capital and labor. Special privileges or immunities are under the control of the Legislature. If granted they may be altered, revoked or repealed by the General Assembly. Const. art. 1, § 2. And, while corporations with valuable franchises may be formed under general laws, all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed. Const. art. 18, § 2. In view of these constitutional provisions, it is clearly within the power of the General Assembly to authorize one class of corporations to use, in the streets, electricity with the grounded circuit as a motive power, and another class to employ the same or a similar agency for the transmission of telegraphic or telephonic messages. And if the proper exercise of the rights granted to the one class under general law is irreconcilable and plainly interferes with a prior grant to a corporation of the other class, it may be construed as the intention of the Legislature to deny an exclusive franchise, if not to repeal the antecedent grant.

In view of the special benefit derived from the grant of corporate power, it is evident that the primary object or design of the State in granting the franchises of telegraph and telephone companies is, in a large measure, to subserve the public benefit and convenience, and not the mere pecuniary advantage of the owners of the corporate property. The exercise of their corporate privileges is subordinate to the accommodation of those who travel on the streets or highways—"the profit to the proprietors being a mere mode of compensating them for their outlay of capital in providing and keeping up the public easement." Shaw, Ch. J. in Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69, 77. It is in contemplation of such companies being thus subservient to the promotion of the public convenience and welfare, that the Legislature has granted to them the privilege, among others, of exercising the power of eminent domain, by entering upon any land and appropriating so much thereof as may be deemed necessary, for the erection and maintenance of poles, piers, abutments, wires and other necessary fixtures.

Having received their corporate franchises from the State, they hold them in implied trust for the benefit of the community at large, and subject to the constitutional grant of legislative power to control the exercise of those franchises, in the future, as the public good may require. A franchise, if granted by the State with a reservation of a right of repeal, must be regarded as a mere privilege while it is suffered to continue, and the Legislature may take it away at any time, and the grantees must rely for the perpetuity and integrity of the franchise granted to them solely upon the faith of the sovereign grantor. Pratt v. Brown, 8 Wis. 603; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 472. But in the absence of such a reservation, its force and effect may be attained through the constitutional power vested in the General Assembly to alter or repeal, from time to time, all general laws under which corporations are formed, and to alter, revoke or repeal all special privileges or immunities that may have been granted.

In illustration of what we have said, is the case Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati S. R. Co., 80 Ohio St. 604. In that case, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company instituted proceedings to appropriate, for the construction of its railroad, the right and privilege of crossing with its track and way the track and way of the Cincinnati, Sandusky & Cleveland Railroad Company. It was the decision of the court, as set forth in the syllabus, that every railroad corporation in this State accepts its charter and franchise, and owns and uses its tracks, subject to the power of the State to authorize the construction of other railroads across its tracks whenever the public welfare may require. Neither the priority of one charter over the other, nor the prior location or construction of a railroad thereunder, affects this right. Under the Constitution and laws of this State, the right of one railroad corporation to cross the track of another in constructing and operating its road is derived by grant of the franchise so to do from the State, and not by purchase or appropriation from the road first located and constructed. The latter has no vested exclusive right to such crossing for its use, against the right of the public to a crossing. The court further held that the railway company, across whose track a right of way was condemned, could not recover for an injury to its franchise as a railroad; and that detention of trains, loss of future business, or additional expenses incident to the future exercise of its corporate powers, could not be taken into the account in estimating consequential damages.

It is contended, however, in behalf of the defendant in error, that conceding the Railway Company and Telegraph Association to be upon an equal footing on the streets and highways in the enjoyment of their respective franchises, the Company is bound to conform to the rule sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. In the view which we take of the relation to each other of the parties to the action, we deem it unnecessary to inquire whether there has been a want of conformity, and to what extent, if any, on the part of the Railway Company, to the requirements of the legal maxim. Nor do we think it necessary to determine how far an incorporated company, making a lawful and careful use of its own property, or of a franchise granted to it by the proper municipal authorities, may be held liable for damages incidentally caused to another.

From the undisputed facts in the case, as disclosed in the record and printed arguments of counsel, it is evident, as we have already seen, that the Railway Company acquired from the State, and from the City of Cincinnati, authority to erect and maintain poles and wires in the streets or highways, and to use electricity as a motive power for its cars. Clothed with such authority, we have, upon weighing the allegations in the original petition, and applying to them the well-settled principles governing the legal rights of the public in the highways, reached the conclusion that the facts set forth in the petition are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We are of the opinion that there has been no invasion of the rights of the Telegraph Association by the plaintiff in error, and that the Telegraph Association is not entitled to the relief prayed for in its petition.

The judgment, therefore, of the Superior Court at General and Special Term must be reversed, and the original petition dismissed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, MIDDLE DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

CUMBERLAND TELEPHONE &amp; TELEGRAPH CO.

UNITED ELECTRIC RAILWAY et al.

*In the present state of electrical science a telephone company cannot maintain a bill for an injunction against the operation of an electric railway to prevent damages incidentally sustained by the escape of electricity from its rails.

(May 19, 1890.)

SUIT to enjoin defendants from using electricity for the propulsion of their cars under any system which makes use of the earth for its return circuit. Injunction denied.

Statement by Brown, J.:

This was a bill in equity to enjoin the use of electricity by the street railways of Nashville under any system which makes use of the earth for its return circuit. The complainant is a Kentucky corporation "empowered" by its charter "to construct and operate lines of telephone." It entered the State of Tennessee, claiming a right under § 1535 of the State Code, which provides that "any person or company may construct a telegraph line along the public highways and streets of this State, or across the rivers, or over any lands belonging to the State, free of charge, and over the lands of private individuals as hereinafter provided, and may erect the necessary fixtures therefor." The City of Nashville gave its consent to the use of its streets by an ordinance passed in 1879, and in that year complainant established a telephone plant, which it has continued to enlarge and improve to the present time. In 1885 an Act was passed by the Legislature of Tennessee authorizing both foreign and domestic corporations to "construct, operate and maintain such telegraph, telephone or other lines necessary for the speedy transmission of intelligence, along and over the public highways and streets of the cities and towns of this State: . . . provided, that the ordinary use of such highways and streets . . . be not thereby obstructed," etc. In 1888 the city passed another ordinance, confirming complainant's rights to the streets and alleys, as then established, and granting the further right to extend its plant as public needs might require. Under these provisions, complainant built and operated its lines of telephone through the streets of Nashville, now having in use about 1,400 telephones, and 1,800 miles of wire.

Defendants are five street railways, all now operated by electricity, under the Sprague and Thompson-Houston systems, and using a single trolley or overhead wire. Three of these roads were originally incorporated by special Act authorizing them to operate street railways by horse-power. By an Act approved March 21, 1887, amending the General Incorporation Laws, all street railways thereafter organized under the general laws of the State were authorized to propel their cars by electricity. Two of these railways were organized under the General Incorporation Laws. By another Act, approved February 28, 1889, all street railway companies which before that time had operated cars by animal power were empowered to operate the same by electricity, provided the city gave its assent. Acting under this supposed authority, one of the defendants, the McGavock & Mt. Vernon Company, proceeded to equip a portion of its road with electricity.

Thereupon, and on April 17, 1889, complainant filed its bill in the chancery court to enjoin it. Before the cause was heard, the parties entered into an agreement by which the Telephone Company agreed to dismiss its bill, to elevate all its wires which might interfere with the operation of the road, to use all means to prevent its wires from coming in contact with the trolley wires of the road, and not to interfere further with the operation of the road, the Railroad Company agreeing, upon its part, to construct at its own expense a return metallic circuit, for the use of the Telephone Company whenever it is ascertained that its service is being injured by electricity generated by the Railway Company, and to use all necessary precautions to prevent the telephone wires from coming in contact with its own wires. In January, 1890, a similar agreement was made between the Telephone Company and the City Electric Railway, with a proviso that if, upon a fair trial, the return wire should not protect the Telephone Company from substantial injury, the parties should be remitted, without prejudice, to their legal rights and remedies as they existed before the agreement was made. The bill charged that the metallic current had not given the relief anticipated, and that complainant was not estopped by this agreement. The gravamen of the bill was that the electricity, which is supposed to return to the dynamos by means of the iron rails, scatters through the earth, and is thereby conducted to the wires of the Telephone Company through various agencies, known as "conduction" or leakage, and this current, being stronger, overcomes the weaker current of the telephone, producing loud, buzzing noises, and wholly preventing, or greatly interfering with, telephonic communication. Besides, the electricity thus conducted acts upon the bells of subscribers when there is no call from the central office, causing them to ring, and also causing a great number of the annunciators at the exchange to fall at one time, so that the operators cannot tell who, if anyone, has called. That if the currents used by the cars were constant and uniform it would not interfere with the telephone. It further averred that the service was interfered with by induction, where a varying current of electricity, conveyed on a conducting wire, will produce in a parallel wire other currents of electricity. The varying current upon the trolley line induces a like current in the parallel telephone wires on the same street, and also, as in the case of conduction, produces the noises and sounds, and rings the bells of subscribers, and throws down the annunciators. The bill also charged that the single trolley was dangerous to life and property. If, by winds and storms, a telephone wire should break, and fall across the trolley, it might be fatal to a man or beast to touch it, and dangerous to the lives of those in the telephone exchanges, sometimes causing fire in the houses of subscribers. The bill concluded that all these troubles and dangers would be avoided if defendant would use an entire metallic circuit, or double trolley, properly constructed, and that the same result would follow if complainant would use a complete metallic circuit for every one of its subscribers, but the latter would nearly double the cost of the plant, and grave difficulties would be encountered at the central office, which it was not certain could be successfully overcome. On the contrary, the single trolley could be converted into a double trolley at a comparatively small expense. That, in consequence of these interferences, subscribers make constant complaints, many threaten to, and some actually do, refuse to pay for their telephones.

The answer did not make an essentially different case, but averred that in February, 1889, all the defendants were sold to the United Electric Railway; that each company had sold its mules, and changed its stabling to an electric-car plant; that the entire system furnishes transportation to 15,000 persons per day. It denied that the metallic return wire has failed to protect the telephone, and averred that little or no trouble was experienced on the route so protected. It further alleged that, of the four methods of equipping electric railways, viz.: storage batteries, the conduit system, double trolley overhead and single trolley overhead, all have substantially proved to be failures, except the last. It denied that the complainant was entitled to a monopoly of the earth for its return circuit, and insisted that it should make use either of a complete metallic circuit, or of a device known as the "McCluer Device" for its return circuit.

Mr. Thomas H. Malone, for complainant:

When the terms of complainant's charter were accepted by the Company, and its lines constructed on the faith of the grant, the Legislature itself could not deprive the Company of the easement granted. But if the relations between the State and the accepting company are not those of contractors, and the Act must be construed as a mere license, revocable at will, certainly the State, and all claiming under the State by subsequent grant, are bound by the terms of the Act until the license shall have been revoked, expressly or by necessary implication.

Troy v. Troy & L. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 657.

The right of defendants to use electricity as a motor depends upon the State's grant, as, in 13 L. R. A.

deed, does their right to use the streets at all.

It is manifest, therefore, that their right is of no higher dignity than complainant's. Each is derived from the same source—the State of Tennessee.

Inasmuch as no special power is given to defendants to condemn property necessary for their purposes, if the enjoyment of their franchise must necessarily deprive complainant of the enjoyment of its franchise, or seriously interfere with its enjoyment, the maxim, "qui prior est in tempore potior est in jure," must apply.

Grants by the Legislature, which may injuriously affect others, should be strictly construed.

Brown, J., delivered the following opinion:

We do not care, in this case, to discuss the constitutionality of the Act of 1885, or the present obligation or effect of the contract entered into between the complainant and two of the defendant railway companies, under which the latter agreed to furnish proper return wires to the Telephone Company in order to obviate the difficulties experienced by the escape of electricity from their rails. We prefer to assume that both these parties are lawfully exercising their franchises, and to consider their respective rights and obligations unembarrassed by any previous contracts or understandings. We see no reason to doubt the position assumed by the complainant, that a telephone company is a telegraph company, and that, under its right to construct and operate telegraphs, it was empowered to establish a telephone service. Atty-Gen. v. Edison 12 L. R. A.

Complainant, in operating its instruments, connects each telephone with the ground by what is termed a "ground wire," through which the return current of electricity is carried to the earth, and perhaps through the earth, acting as a conductor, back to the telephone exchange. Such return, in some form or other, is necessary to the production of a current of electricity in every case. Defendants, upon the other hand, use a single overhead wire or trolley, suspended over the middle of the track, along which the electric current passes, descending by the trolley rod or mast through the cars to the motors underneath, and thence to the rails, which are connected together at their ends, and which operate to convey the return current back to the dynamo at the power-house. The evidence, however, establishes the fact that the current does not all return by the rails. Much of it escapes, becomes scattered through the earth, ascends through the ground wires to the telephones, and seriously impairs their operation, by causing a humming or buzzing noise, which drowns the voice of the speaker, and often causes the annunciators in the exchange to fall, and the bells to give false calls, so that it is impossible for the operators to tell which, if any, of its subscribers have called, and, in short, throws the whole system into confusion.

That these evils exist, to the serious detriment of the telephone service, is not denied; but it also appears from the evidence upon both sides that they are not absolutely insurmountable. Indeed, there are but few serious questions of fact in this case, and these turn upon the relative practicability and expense of the several methods of overcoming this difficulty. In solving these questions, we are compelled to bear in mind the fact that the science of electricity is still in its experimental stage; that a device which to-day may be the best, cheapest and most practicable, may, in another year, be superseded by something incomparably better fitted for the purpose. It is quite possible, too, that the legal obligations of the parties may change with the progress of invention, and the duty of surmounting the difficulty be thrown upon one party or the other, as a cheaper or more effectual remedy is discovered. For example, if it were shown that by the use of a certain device the defendants could control their return current in such a way as not to interfere with the use of complainant's instruments, the law might treat their failure to adopt such measures as negligence in the use of their franchise, and enjoin them, or hold them liable for all damages sustained by the complainant. If, upon the other hand, the difficulty can be better controlled by a device applicable to telephones, it might be incumbent upon the complainant to adopt it, leaving the courts to settle the further question, whether the expense of so doing is recoverable of the defendants. We are thus compelled to consider this case with reference to the present state of the art, and with the possibility that in another year circumstances may so change as to reverse completely the legal obligations of the parties. Indeed, since the litigation between the telephone companies and the electric railway companies originally began, considerable progress has been made towards a solution of the problem. Let us consider the respective methods now suggested:

1. The double trolley. There seems to be no doubt that if defendants adopt a second trolley wire, the return current might be carried back to the dynamos without coming in contact with the earth at all, and the difficulty be completely overcome. Upon the other hand, we are satisfied from the affidavits that this would not only entail a large expense upon the defendants, but that it disfigures the streets with a complicated network of wires, and, wherever there are curves, turn-outs or switches, renders the road very difficult of operation. There are two of these double-trolley roads in operation in Cincinnati; and they are used to a limited extent in other cities. But the fact that nine tenths of the electric railways in this country are equipped with a single trolley, and that, in most of the cities where the double trolley was formerly used, including Montgomery, Pittsburgh, Denver, Albany and Appleton, they have been abandoned, are strong arguments against their practicability. Indeed, it is only where the roads make use of a double track that the double trolley can be made a success. Add to this that, in the numerous cases between the telephone companies and the electric railways which have arisen in other States, the courts have uniformly held the double trolley to be a failure as applied to single tracks, and it would seem that the question could no longer be considered an open one.

2. There seems to be no doubt that the evil may also be remedied by a return wire attached to each telephone, by which the current is carried directly back to the exchange, instead of being dumped into the earth. This, however, is open to the same objection as the double trolley. It is not only very expensive, doubling the cost of the electric plant, but would double the number of wires carried through our streets, already far too numerous for comfort, beauty or safety. In addition to this, it involves a large outlay and increased complication and expense for the central office, there being not only two line wire terminals to provide for every subscriber, but four terminals to handle for every connection, instead of two, as with the single wire and earth systems. Upon the whole, we deem this to be impracticable.

3. A third device, known as the "McCluer System," remains to be considered. This contemplates the employment of a single return wire upon each route disturbed by the railway service, to which each telephone upon that route is connected, and which operates to complete the metallic circuit. If we are to believe the affidavits of those who are familiar with this device, it affords a perfect remedy for all disturbances produced by leakage or conduction, though there are also slight disturbances produced by induction from parallel wires, from which no complete relief has been discovered by any kind of metallic circuit, unless supplemented by the use of non-inducting cables, and the transposition of wires. This evil, however, is remediable by increasing the distance between the parallel wires, and does not seem to be regarded as a serious matter. It is true, defendants have produced affidavits which tend to throw some doubt upon the utility of the McCluer device, but this doubt seems to have arisen more from the reluctance of the telephone companies to adopt it than from any proven insufficiency. We think we are justified in assuming that the adoption of this device by the complainant would obviate the disturbances now produced by leakage.

The case, then, practically resolves itself into the question, At whose expense shall this change be made? As the testimony tends to show that the introduction of the McCluer device into the telephone service of Nashville would not cost to exceed $10 to each telephone, the question is not vital to the existence of either of these companies. At the same time, as it is one that confronts the telephone and electric railways in every city of the country where both are used, it becomes of great importance. Are the telephone companies which have the prior rights to use the streets, bound to conform their business to the demands of these new-comers, though by so doing they put themselves to large expense? Or are the railway companies bound, as a condition of occupying the same territory, to see to it that, in operating their roads, no incidental damage is done to their neighbors?

If the existence of one was absolutely incompatible with the continued operation of the other, it might be incumbent upon us to make a choice between these two great benefactions, both of which will rank among the necessities of modern urban life. But, as we are bound to assume that they can be persuaded to live together in harmony, the case virtually resolves itself into a question of liability for certain damages sustained by the complainant. In this view it is open to serious doubt whether it is entitled to invoke the aid of a court of equity at all. Conceding that the case made by the bill is one of equitable jurisdiction, still the granting or withholding of an injunction is largely a matter of discretion, and if, upon all the pleadings and the testimony, the court can see that it involves a mere question of dollars and cents, it may well hesitate to stop the operation of these roads by resorting to the harsh remedy of an injunction, especially in view of the fact that defendants are amply able to make reparation. We do not desire, however, to dispose of the case upon this ground.

It would be perfectly competent for us to stay the issue of an injunction, as has already been done in one or two cases, until a reasonable time had elapsed for the ascertainment and payment of these damages; and, as both parties have addressed their arguments to the question of liability, we are disposed to give them the benefit of our views.

We are referred in this connection to a large number of decisions of courts of the highest respectability, upon the very questions involved in this case. If these decisions had been harmonious, we should not have hesitated to defer to them; but, as these courts have reached different results, we do not feel like indicating a preference for one or the other. While all are persuasive none are controlling; and we have deemed it more satisfactory to treat this as an original question, and inquire how far it may be answered by the application of well settled principles.

We are asked to determine how far a person making a lawful and careful use of his own property, or of a franchise granted to him by the proper municipal authorities, is liable for damages incidentally caused to another; in other words, whether the right of the other to an injunction does not depend upon something more than the simple fact that he has suffered injury, though his right to an undisturbed use of his own may antedate that of another. It is true that in one case, namely, Rheinhardt v. Mentasti, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 685, it is said that the principle governing the jurisdiction of the court in cases of nuisance does not depend upon the question whether the defendant is using his own reasonably or otherwise, but upon the question, Does he injure his neighbors? This case lays down a broader doctrine of liability than any to which our attention has been called, but it is sufficient to say in reply to it that nothing which is authorized by competent authority can be treated as a nuisance per se. Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 886; Hinchman v. Paterson Horse R. Co. 17 N. J. Eq. 77; Easton v. New York & L. E. R. Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 68; Grand Rapids & L. R. Co. v. Heise, 88 Mich. 52; Davis v. Mayor, 14 N. Y. 506.

We take it to be well settled, so far as persons operating under legislative grants are concerned, that something more than mere incidental damage to another must be proved—something, in fact, in the nature of an abuse of the franchise—to entitle the party injured to an injunction. It is perfectly obvious that there are a large number of instances in which a person may suffer damages without recourse to the offender. Thus, the smoke that fills our lungs and soils our garments; the dust that enters our dwellings and stores, and damages our furniture; the noxious odors that assail our nostrils; the impure water we are sometimes compelled to drink,—are the necessary penalties we pay for living in cities; but in ordinary cases there is no legal remedy for the evil. In the somewhat flowery language of Lord Justice James, in Salvin v. North Brancepeth Coal Co., L. R. 9 Ch. 705: "If some picturesque haven opens its arms to invite the commerce of the world, it is not for this court to forbid the embrace, although the fruit of it should be the sights and sounds and smells of a common seaport and ship-building town, which would drive the Dryads and their masters from their ancient solitudes."

I may expend a fortune in building a handsome house thirty or forty feet from my front fence. My neighbors upon either side may build theirs upon the line of the street, and completely ruin its market value. In the absence of a prescriptive right on my part, they may wall up my windows, and completely exclude the light, or undermine the foundation of my outer wall so that it crack or tumble down. But, if it be necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of their own property, I have no remedy. Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92.

There are undoubtedly a large number of cases where persons have been held liable for an infringement upon the maxim, sic utere tuo 12 L. R. A.

ut alienum non laedas; but, upon examination, they will usually be found to turn upon questions of negligence or nuisance.

1. There is no doubt that every person is bound to the exercise of reasonable care in the use of his own property; and, for any default in that particular, he will be liable to the person injured in an action for negligence. Thus, in Vaughan v. Menlove, 8 Bing. N. C. 468, defendant was held liable for negligence in building a hay-rick so near the extremity of his own land that, in consequence of its spontaneous ignition, his neighbor's house was burned; although, in Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass. 494, this principle was limited to cases where the burning was negligent, or might reasonably have been expected to have injured the property of a neighbor. This was the real ground upon which a recovery was permitted in the leading case of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 8 H. L. 830, though the case is often cited for the broader proposition, that the person who, for his own purpose, brings on his lands and collects and keeps everything there likely to do mischief if it escapes must keep it at his peril. This case has not been accepted either in England or in this country without some qualifications. The same rule applies if a man permit a wall which had been negligently constructed to fall upon his neighbor's house (Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 383), or a chimney to which a gas-light company had fastened a telegraph wire. Gray v. Boston Gas-Light Co. 114 Mass. 149.

The principle of these cases was also applied in Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 814, where it was held to be the duty of a person hanging a lamp over the highway to keep it in good repair. This case proceeds, perhaps, as far as any in holding the defendant responsible.

To the same principle is also referable the case of Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbots, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 1, whereby the defendants were held liable for using steam-rollers, in repairing a highway, so heavy that they injured the gas pipes of the plaintiff. The statement of the case shows that the pipes were laid from twenty to twenty-four inches beneath the surface of the streets, and that this was a sufficient depth to prevent their being injured by the ordinary travel of the streets, and also by the ordinary mode of repair, if steam rollers of great weight had not been used. The decision was put by the court upon the express ground that heavier rollers were used than were necessary; and it was said that, if "the defendants were expressly authorized by statute to use steam-rollers of such a weight as necessarily to injure the plaintiffs' pipes, the plaintiffs would have no ground of complaint. The case would then be one of damnum absque injuria. The same consequence would follow if the defendants were expressly authorized by statute to repair in some way which necessarily required the use of heavy steam rollers, or other machinery which could not be worked without injuring the plaintiffs' pipes."

2. Similar to these are the cases in which persons have been held liable for keeping upon their land anything which operates as a nuisance to their neighbors generally, or to any particular individual. Upon this principle, if a person allows a privy to get out of repair and the water percolates into his neighbor's cellar (Tenant v. Golding, 1 Salk. 21; Ball v. Nye, 99 Mass. 583; Ballard v. Tomlinson, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 115; Cooley, Torts, 568); or maintains a mill-dam in an unsafe condition (Mayor v. Bailey, 2 Denio, 438; Gray v. Harris, 107 Mass. 492); or permits injurious accumulations of snow or ice upon his roof (Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 106 Mass. 194); or permits loud and unnecessary noises (Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354; Tanner v. Albion, 5 Hill, 121); or carries on a trade offensive to the neighborhood by reason of dust, smoke, foul odors, or jar of machinery, or otherwise (Cooley, Torts, 600, 601).—he is liable for the consequences. In all this class of cases, the question whether the carrying on of an offensive business is a nuisance or not depends very largely upon the character of the neighborhood, the time it has been carried on without objection and the prior use of the buildings in the vicinity, as a trade may be adjudged a nuisance in one place and not in another. Gilbert v. Showerman, 23 Mich. 448; Robinson v. Baugh, 81 Mich. 290.

A leading case in the federal courts is that of Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 817, 27 L. ed. 789. In that case it was held that legislative authority to a railroad company to bring its tracks within the limits of the City of Washington, and to construct shops and engine-houses there, did not confer upon it authority to erect noisy workshops in the immediate vicinity of a church where services had been held several times during the week for a number of years before the erection of the shops. But, in delivering the opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Field drew a distinction between nuisances of that description, and a railway through the streets authorized by Congress, which, when used with reasonable care, produces only that incidental inconvenience which unavoidably follows the additional occupation of the streets by its cars, with the noises and disturbances necessarily attending their use, and affords no ground of complaint. "Whatever consequential annoyance may necessarily follow from the running of the cars on the road with reasonable care is damnum absque injuria."

3. There are also a few cases which indicate that, even if a man be guilty of no negligence, but is engaged in doing something dangerous in its nature, he is liable for the immediate and direct consequences of his acts. Thus in Hay v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. 159, the defendant, a corporation engaged in digging a canal, was held liable for blasting rocks in such a way that the fragments were thrown against and injured plaintiff's dwelling, upon lands adjoining. It was held that it was liable although no negligence or want of skill was alleged or proved. The doctrine laid down in this case, however, was carefully limited in the subsequent case of Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, in which the owner of a steam-boiler was held not to be liable for damages occasioned by its explosion, in the absence of proof of fault or negligence on his part; and it was said that the defendant was held liable in the Cohoes Case upon the ground that its acts in casting the rocks upon the plaintiff's premises were direct and immediate. In the same line is the case of Cahill v. Eastman, 12 L. R. A.

18 Minn. 324 (Gil. 292), in which the defendants were held liable for the consequences of an ordinary spring freshet, without proof of negligence or unskillfulness on their part in the construction and maintenance of a tunnel through which water flowed and damaged the plaintiff's mill. Defendants' liability was put upon the ground that the damages the plaintiff sustained were the direct and immediate result of defendants' operations on their own land. "The plaintiffs had a right to hold their property free of such a result of the defendants' use of their land." The authorities are carefully collated, and the opinion is a very instructive one. These cases would be apposite, if the defendants had found it necessary, in the construction of their line, to cut the wires of the Telephone Company, remove its posts or commit any other direct depredation upon its property.

4. Subject to these exceptions we understand the law to be well settled that no person is liable for damages incidentally occasioned to another by the necessary and beneficial use of his own property, or of a franchise granted to him by the State. The principle is thus stated by Judge Woodworth, in Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92-99: "On reviewing the cases, I am of opinion that no man is answerable in damages for the reasonable exercise of a right, when it is accompanied by a cautious regard for the rights of others, when there is no just ground for the charge of negligence or unskillfulness, and when the act is not done maliciously."

Illustrations of this principle are plentifully scattered through the reports. It extends not merely to the digging up of ground for a new building, whereby the walls of the next house are injured (Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92-99; Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220), but to the burning of fallow land, whereby fire is communicated to adjoining lands (Clark v. Foot, 8 Johns. 421), to the erection of a mill-dam, whereby water is in part diverted from a lower mill (Platt v. Johnson, 15 Johns. 218), to the building of a basin or bridge, whereby access to plaintiff's dock is obstructed (Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 148, 4 Wend. 9; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 713, 18 L. ed. 96), and even to the pollution of a stream by the discharge of tan-bark from an upper mill, which was suffered to float down upon the mill of the plaintiff, where it was shown to have been the uniform custom of the country to permit it. Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 459.

A distinction is drawn between cases where the pollution of a stream is indispensable to its beneficial use, and cases where the pollution is such as to make it absolutely useless to manufacturers lower down the river. Of the latter class is Merrifield v. Lombard, 18 Allen, 16, where the defendant threw vitriol and other noxious substances into the stream a short distance above plaintiff's factory, by means of which the water was corrupted so that it corroded plaintiff's engine and boiler and rendered them unfit for use. In such cases the court will weigh the circumstances and necessities of the case, and the manner in which the stream has heretofore been used. Cooley, Torts, 587.

In the case of Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. San- derson, 118 Pa. 126, 4 Cent. Rep. 475, it was held that one operating a coal mine in the ordinary and usual manner may drain or pump water upon his own lands, which percolates into the stream which forms the natural drainage of the basin in which the mine was situated, although the quantity of water may thereby be increased, and its quality be so affected as to render it totally unfit for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners. It was intimated that the use and enjoyment of a stream of pure water for domestic purposes must, from the necessity of the case, give way to the interests of the communities, in order to permit the development of the natural resources of the country, and to make possible the prosecution of the lawful business of mining coal. It is said, in the opinion of the court, to be "a general proposition, that every man has the right to the natural use and enjoyment of his own property; and if, whilst lawfully in such use and enjoyment, without negligence or malice on his part, an unavoidable loss occurs to his neighbor, it is damnum absque injuria; for the rightful use of one's own land may cause damage to another, without any legal wrong."

The same principle is applicable to the case of a public officer, who, if authorized by law to excavate earth in grading a street, or constructing a tunnel, will not be responsible in the absence of negligence for damage to abutting property owners. Smith v. Washington Corp., 61 U. S. 20 How. 185, 15 L. ed. 858; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 685, 25 L. ed. 336; Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418; Radcliff v. Mayor, 4 N. Y. 195. In this last case, it is said that an act done under lawful authority, if done in a proper manner, can never subject the party to an action, whatever consequences may follow. The case of McCombs v. Akron, 15 Ohio, 474, in which it was held that a corporation was liable for injuries to plaintiff's property in cutting down and grading a street, is opposed to the great weight of authority, and in a number of cases has been denied to be law. See also Chapman v. Albany & S. R. Co. 10 Barb. 860. In West Cumberland I. & S. Co. v. Kenyon, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 778, it is said, with regard to the storage of water upon defendant's land, that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show, not only that he had sustained damage, but that the defendant had caused it by going beyond what was necessary in order to enable him to have the natural use of his own land. In Atty-Gen. v. Colney H. L. Asylum, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 146, defendant was held liable for polluting a stream by its sewage, upon the ground that the evil might have been remedied by depositing the sewage elsewhere. Other instances of serious damage, suffered without the possibility of recourse, may occur whenever a rival bridge is authorized to be built across a stream, as was done in Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. ed. 778.

The building of a new railroad may destroy the value of a turnpike, of a line of coaches, of taverns, public houses, and even of small towns lying along its line. Illustrations are found in Boulton v. Crother, 2 Barn. & C. 708, and Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 10 Exch. 255.

In Rockwood v. Wilson, 11 Cush. 226, it is said that "nothing can be better settled than that, if one do a lawful act upon his own premises, he cannot be held responsible for injurious consequences that may result from it, unless it was so done as to constitute actionable negligence." What shall be considered indirect, as distinguished from direct, injuries, is clearly stated in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541, 12 Cent. Rep. 261, in which a construction was given to a constitutional provision of Pennsylvania securing just compensation by corporations for property "injured or destroyed," as well as "taken." It was held to be confined to such injuries to one's property as are actual, positive and visible,—the natural and necessary results of the original construction or enlargement of its works by a corporation, and of such certain character that compensation therefor may be ascertained at the time the works are being constructed or enlarged, and paid or secured in advance, as distinguished from indirect injuries to the plaintiff, which were the result merely of a subsequent operation of its railroad in lawful manner, without negligence, unskillfulness or malice.

The substance of all the cases we have met with in our examination of this question—and we have cited but a small fraction of them—is that, where a person is making lawful use of his own property, or of a public franchise, in such a manner as to occasion injury to another, the question of his liability will depend upon the fact whether he has made use of the means which, in the progress of science and improvement, have been shown by experience to be the best; but he is not bound to experiment with recent inventions, not generally known, or to adopt expensive devices, when it lies in the power of the person injured to make use himself of an effective and inexpensive method of prevention. Hoyt v. Jeffers, 30 Mich. 181. If in the case under consideration it were shown that the double trolley would obviate the injury to complainant without exposing defendants or the public to any great inconvenience or a large expense, we think it would be their duty to make use of it, and should have no doubt of our power to aid the complainant by an injunction; but, as the proof shows that a more effectual and less objectionable and expensive remedy is open to the complainant, we think the obligation is upon the Telephone Company to adopt it, and that defendants are not bound to indemnify it; in other words that the damage incidentally done to the complainant is not such as is justly chargeable to the defendants. Unless we are to hold that the Telephone Company has a monopoly of the use of the earth, and of all the earth within the City of Nashville, for its feeble current, not only as against the defendants, but as against all forms of electrical energy which, in the progress of science and invention, may hereafter require its use, we do not see how this bill can be maintained. We place our denial of an injunction upon the grounds:

1. That the defendants are making lawful use of the franchise conferred upon them by the State, in a manner contemplated by the Statute, and that such Act cannot be considered as a nuisance in itself.

2. That, in the exercise of such franchise, no negligence has been shown, and no wanton, or unnecessary disregard of the rights of the complainant.

3. That the damages occasioned to the complainant are not the direct consequence of the construction of the defendants' roads, but are incidental damages resulting from their operation, and are not recoverable.

The cases involving this principle are almost innumerable; and in our examination of them we are satisfied the great weight of authority bears in the direction we have indicated.

As a result, the motion for an injunction must be denied.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

O. Wilbur FIELDS
v.
Sidney V. OSBORNE et al

(....Conn....)

1. A political party the name of which can be placed on ballots under the Election Law is formed where a Republican caucus votes to adjourn for the organization of a citizens' caucus and thereupon some Democrats unite with the Republicans present and nominate a citizens' ticket, which is voted at a town meeting, although no committees are appointed or any steps taken to effect a permanent organization.
2. Courts cannot inquire into the motives which underlie the formation of a political party in determining whether or not it has such an existence as to be entitled to issue separate election ballots bearing its name.
3. The fact that the real object of a caucus failed of accomplishment is not sufficient to show that no political party was formed which would be entitled to issue election ballots bearing its name.
4. Ballots cast at a town meeting, which include the name of a candidate for judge of probate, who can be legally elected only at a state election, or which have the words "and ex officio Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths," added to the name of the office of town clerk, are invalid under Pub. Acts 1890, chap. 247, which provides that ballots shall contain in addition to the official indorsement, only the "names of the candidates, the office voted for and the name of the political party."
5. The use of the word "for" before the name of each office named in a ballot does not necessarily invalidate the ballot under Pub. Acts 1890, chap. 247, prohibiting any words thereon except the official indorsement, the names of candidates, the office voted for and the name of the political party.

The violations of law in the matter of the citizen's ballots are plain and distinct, especially in the use of the words "For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman." That violation of the law is so plain and distinct that it comes within the ruling made by this court in the case of Talcott v. Philbrick, 10 L. R. A. 150, 59 Conn. 472.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This petition was brought under section 59 of the General Statutes. The petitioner alleges that he was a candidate for selectman at the annual meeting of the Town of Branford, held on the first Monday of October, 1890; that he verily believes he received a sufficient number of votes to elect him; that he was not declared elected, but, on the contrary, the respondents were declared elected selectmen for the then ensuing year. The facts upon which his claim is based, so far as they are important to the decision of the case, are in said petition stated as follows: That more than 100 ballots were counted for the respondents which were illegal and void, and ought not to have been counted, 'because they had upon them other words, and contained other words than the names of the candidates, the office voted for, the name of the party issuing the ballot, and the official indorsement; and such words were not alterations or changes of the ballot, within the provisions of section 12, chapter 247, of the Public Acts of 1889. Said one hundred and more ballots were cast in violation of the provisions of said Act, and did not conform to its requirements, because they did not contain the word 'Republican' or the words 'Republican Party,' but did contain at the top of the ballots the words 'Citizens' Ticket.' Said one hundred and more ballots also contained at the bottom of said ballots the following illegal words: 'For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman.' Thereupon the petitioner prays that he may be granted a certificate entitling him to hold and exercise the duties and powers of a selectman in said town." The case was heard and reserved for the advice of this court.

In respect to the first claim, the circumstances attending the origin and history of the "Citizens'" ticket are detailed in the finding. We extract such as are to the purpose. Pursuant to public notice a Republican caucus was held October 4, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the town offices to be filled at the town meeting aforesaid. Immediately after the caucus was organized a plan for making up a Citizens' ticket, from candidates of all political parties, was advocated. After discussion it was voted that the Republican caucus adjourn, and that a Citizens' caucus be organized. Thereupon some ten or fifteen Democrats, who were present, but had not participated in the proceedings, came forward, and acted with the about fifty Republicans who were present, in nominating the Citizens' ticket. The candidates nominated were Republicans, except those for town clerk, treasurer, and one grand juror, who were Democrats. A general collection was taken to defray the expense of printing the ticket. No committees were appointed at said caucus to carry out its purposes, nor were any steps taken to effect a permanent organization of a Citizens' party, or to provide for its further existence. The chairman of the Republican town committee procured the printing of said Citizens' tickets, and caused them to be placed in the booths on election day. The Republican party issued no tickets, and no ballots were used at the election except those headed "Democratic" and those headed "Citizens' Ticket." Previous to the caucus in question there had been no call issued for a Citizens' caucus, nor any organized political party in the Town of Branford known as the "Citizens' Party," but there had been some talk among a few Republicans and Democrats about the possibility of having a Citizens' caucus, and of turning the Republican caucus, that had been called, into a Citizens' caucus. Occasionally, in previous years, town officers have been elected in said town on tickets denominated "Citizens' Ticket."

We are abundantly satisfied from the facts stated in the finding that for the time being, and for the purposes of the election under consideration, and within the meaning of the law requiring the ballots to contain the name of the party issuing them, there was a Citizens' party in Branford. The element of time is not essential to the formation of a legal party. It may spring into existence from the exigencies of a particular election, and with no intention of continuing after the exigency has passed. To hold the contrary would be to strike a blow at that independence in political action upon which the good government of a locality may depend. Nor can the number of voters that must unite in order to form a legal party be prescribed by law without violating one of the fundamental theories of popular government. If it is shown, as it is in this case, that an independent political party was formed, that it assumed a distinctive name, and that the ballots which it issued sought the suffrages of the people under no false title, but bore the name of the political party issuing them, it is enough, so far as the point now being considered is concerned. To hold otherwise would be to abridge rights which are not only generally held to be sacred, but which it is of the utmost importance to preserve. The petitioner lays some stress upon the finding that the real object and intent of holding the Citizens' caucus was to nominate a ticket to defeat a certain candidate for selectman who had already been nominated at the Democratic caucus, by nominating another Democrat who had been an unsuccessful candidate for the same office in such Democratic caucus. That may or may not have been a laudable object. We have no data from which to judge. But no one will seriously contend that courts can inquire into the motives which underlie the formation of political parties. Nor is the further suggestion sound,—that because the real object of the caucus failed of accomplishment, and the hoped-for candidate for selectman was not nominated, therefore no Citizens' party was formed. Notwithstanding such failure, a Citizens' ticket was nominated and a Citizens' ballot issued and voted.

The second reason stated in the petition for granting the certificate is because said 100 and more (Citizens') ballots also contained, at the bottom of said ballots, the following illegal words: "For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman." It appears that the Citizens' caucus, in addition to the town officers that could be voted for at the annual town meeting, also nominated Henry H. Steadman for the office of judge of probate, who, by statute, could only be voted for for said office at the election held for state officers, etc., on the Tuesday following the first Monday of November thereafter, and that each of the "Citizens' Tickets" had upon it the words "For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman." It also appears that the Democratic ballots issued and cast at said election contained, after the words "For Town Clerk," the words "and ex officio Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths."

The Act concerning elections, passed in 1889, for the purpose of securing uniformity in the ballots used at electors' meetings, and all regular town and city elections, made certain express provisions as to the contents, among other things, of such ballots. The first section requires that, "in addition to the official indorsement, the ballots shall contain only the names of the candidates, the office voted for, and the name of the political party issuing the same." The ninth section provides that, if any ballot "shall contain any mark or device, so that the same may be identified in such manner as to indicate who might have cast the same, it shall not be counted," etc. All ballots cast in violation of the provisions of the Act, or which do not conform to the requirements thereof, as contained in the sections preceding the twelfth, said section declares, "shall be void and not counted," with a proviso which does not affect this case. Now there can be no question but that the Legislature intended to say that a ballot which failed to accord with certain specifically enumerated requirements should be void, irrespective of all considerations as to the intent or effect of such failure. It considered uniformity an important means of preventing fraud, and there were certain matters in which uniformity could be expressly provided for. But ballots which satisfied the express standard of uniformity might yet be made to lack entire uniformity, and so be identified by various devices which the Legislature could neither provide against nor foresee; so section 9 was added. As it stands, therefore, there are certain particulars so clearly stated in the Act that it can be seen at a glance whether a given ballot conforms to them. As to them there is no room for construction. It is not within the province of the court to say what the consequence of the failure to conform shall be; the Act itself fixes it. Though, ordinarily, there can be little difficulty in deciding whether a ballot conforms to the requirements of the first section of the Act, yet not everything can be settled by mere inspection. For instance, it is a question of fact to be proved whether the party whose name the ballot contains in fact issued it. The meaning and intent of the words "the office voted for," used in describing the contents of the ballot, may be open to construction, and the question whether that provision has been violated may depend upon circumstances. But whether the ballots in question which in fact contained the words "For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman," in addition to the official indorsement, the names of the candidates who could be legally voted for, the office voted for, and the name of the political party issuing the same, complied with the requirements of the law admits of no discussion. At the time the ballots were issued and cast, there was no election for judge of probate. That office could not be filled at a town election. The title of the office and the name of the candidate were foreign to the ballot, and were inserted in violation of the express and unambiguous terms of the Act. So, too, in respect to the words "and ex officio Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths," contained in the Democratic ballots; they were inserted in violation of the Act. There is no such office as that named in the ballots. Chapter 181 of the Public Acts of 1889 gives the names of the town offices to be filled at the town elections. Among them is the office of "town clerk." Section 98 of the General Statutes provides that town clerks of the several towns shall be ex officio the registrars of births, marriages and deaths in their respective towns, except in the towns where such registrars are elected under special laws. Nowhere in the statutes are town clerks called anything but town clerks. It needs no argument to prove that the duties performed ex officio by the incumbent of an office form no part of the legal title of the office, unless it is so expressed.

It being clear that the words "For Judge of Probate, Henry H. Steadman," on the Citizens' ballots, and the words "and ex officio Registrar of Births, Marriages and Deaths," on the Democratic ballots, both come within the express prohibition of the law, what is our duty? If it was doubtful whether the Act applied to them, if their legality depended upon a construction of the meaning of the language of the Act, our duty might not be plain, except to decide in favor of the right to vote. If they could be held to fall within the prohibition of any mark or device, contained in the ninth section, instead of within the express prohibitions of the first section, then it would be our duty to inquire whether they constituted a mark or device by which the ballot might be identified in such manner as to indicate who might have cast the same. But no. A plain provision of the law is violated in a point concerning which the Act does not authorize us to inquire into the intent or the consequences of the violation. In short, the Legislature has seen fit to say if a ballot contains the addition to the specified contents which these do it shall be void. Unless we are prepared to hold the Act unconstitutional we cannot disregard its requirements. If it is harsh and unreasonable, the remedy is with the Legislature that enacted it, and not with the courts, which are bound to respect it. In regard to provisions which are plain on their face, which are not dependent upon the question of good faith, or the actual or possible result of disregarding them, we can only say again, in the language of the majority opinion in Talcott v. Philbrick, 59 Conn. 478, 10 L. R. A. 150: "We are relieved of any obligation to inquire into the necessity or reason of such requirement; and we are not at liberty to dispense with anything that is required, whatever the reason for it may be, or even if without any apparent reason at all. The Legislature has spoken, and obedience is our first and only duty. It is at liberty to throw around the ballot-box such safeguards and regulations as it may deem proper, and it is the duty of the citizen to conform thereto. Some inconvenience is not too great a price to pay for an honest, pure ballot."

The conclusions to which we have thus come are themselves decisive of the case. In addition, however, to the claims already considered, the record shows that the defendants claimed that the Democratic ballots are illegal because the word "for" is printed on each of them before the name of every office named therein. This presents a question of some difficulty, and because it does we are satisfied that we have come to a correct solution of it. If it was plain and clear that the Act, in limiting the contents of the ballot to the official indorsement, the names of the candidates, the name of the political party issuing the same, and "the office voted for," prohibited the use of the word "for" before the title to the office, we should be bound, upon the principles which we have herein already recognized as sound, to declare the ballots void for that reason. But that the Statute so intended is not plain and clear. On the contrary, the language is ambiguous. There is room for honest and intelligent men to differ as to its meaning. The record in this very case shows that the secretary of the State, in a notice concerning elections issued in August, 1888, immediately after the Act went into force, and before any discussion had arisen upon the point in hand, inclosed a printed form for a town ballot. This was sent to every postmaster and town clerk and to the respective chairmen of the Democratic and Republican committees in every town in the State; and the form of ballot so sent contained the word "for" before the title to every office named therein. It is a matter of public notoriety also that ballots prepared by different persons, equally determined to observe the requirements of the law, have in some cases contained the word "for" in juxtaposition with the offices voted for, and sometimes omitted it. The Republican ballots as well as the Democratic ballots in the case before us contained the word. We refer to these instances in confirmation of our position that the language under consideration is in fact ambiguous. If ambiguous, it is the proper subject of construction. In discharging the duty of construing it so that the voter shall not be deprived of his vote, except upon a plain and unambiguous provision of the law, we feel bound to hold that the Act does not, in terms and expressly, nor by necessary construction, prohibit the use of the word "for" before the title to the office. It follows, therefore, that neither its use nor the failure to use it necessarily and of itself invalidates a ballot. The question of illegality is remitted to the provisions of the ninth section of the Act. If the regular ballots issued by a political party contain the word "for" before the title to the offices therein named, then it cannot be held to be a "mark or device," so that the same may be identified in such manner as to indicate who might have cast the same, and, therefore, is not obnoxious to that provision. If the regular ballots of a political party omit the word "for" in the connection stated, then the use of the word on some of the ballots cast, inasmuch as it would be a mark or device by which the same might be identified, would be illegal. Each case must be governed by its own circumstances, and be decided as a question of fact under the principles herein stated. Upon the facts in this case, we hold that the ballots in question were not illegal and void because of the use of the word "for." They were, however, illegal, as we have already stated, for another reason.

Being illegal, there is no foundation for the petitioner's claim that he was elected selectman, and his petition, which was based upon that claim, must be dismissed. We so advise.

Carpenter and Loomis, JJ., concur. Andrews, O. J., and Torrance, J., concur in the judgment, and fully in so much of the opinion as discusses the "for" ballots; but in the other parts of the opinion they concur because they felt bound by the case of Talcott v. Philbrick, and did not intend, in so doing, to change or modify what was said by them in their dissenting opinion in that case.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Rose SHINNERS

v.

PROPRIETORS OF LOCKS & CANALS ON MERRIMACK RIVER.

(....Mass. ....)

1. An exception to the exclusion of a question cannot be maintained where there is nothing to show what the answer would have been or what exceptant offered to prove thereby.

2. Precautions after an accident to prevent other accidents cannot be proved for the purpose of showing that they were needed at the time of the accident as an admission of negligence.

(June 26, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Superior Court for Middlesex County, excluding certain evidence at the trial of an action brought by plaintiff under Stat. 1887, NOTE.—Of exceptions to the exclusion of evidence; views of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

A very recent rule in the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, cited in the principal case, fully establishes the accuracy of the decision. Mr. Justice Allen holds, in the course of the opinion, that where there is nothing to show what the testimony of the defendant would have been if admitted, or what the defendant offered to prove thereby, or that it would in any respect have been material, an exception to the exclusion of the question asked is not open to review in the appellate court. Hathaway v. Tinkham, 148 Mass. 85. See also Wheeler v. Rice, 8 Cush. 205; Brown v. Leach, 107 Mass. 384; Baker v. Gavitt, 128 Mass. 98; New Haven & N. Co. v. Campbell, 128 Mass. 104; Stone v. Sargent, 129 Mass. 508.

The same court, in a still more recent case, has 12 L. R. A.

re-affirmed this ruling; and in Farnum v. Pitcher, 151 Mass. 470, it was held that an exception to the exclusion of the question cannot be maintained where it fails to show what the answer would have been, or what the party asking the question offered or expected to prove by the answer. Still another application of the same rule appears in the case of Crowley v. Appleton, 148 Mass. 98. Here was an exception to the exclusion of a question, but an entire absence of anything tending to show what the answer would have been or what the plaintiff offered to prove by the evidence which was excluded. This failure to disclose the object of the question asked proved fatal to the efficacy of the exception. The bill of exceptions should have indicated the nature and scope of the exception, and the court says: "This has been so often determined that it hardly requires the citation of authority to sustain chap. 970, § 2, to recover damages for the loss of her husband, who was alleged to have been killed by defendant's negligence, which action resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Charles Cowley, for plaintiff:

Evidence that precautions were taken, immediately after the killing of plaintiff's husband, to prevent parts of the bank from falling, is admissible to show that such precautions were needed at the time of the killing.

Dale v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 472; Brennan v. Lachar, 14 Daly. 197; Shattuck v. Rand, 2 New Eng. Rep. 159, 143 Mass. 88; Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 374; Mandershid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 87; Smith v. Ryan, 8 N. Y. Supp. 853.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has never swerved from the doctrine that such evidence as was here excluded is admissible.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 5 Pa. 315; West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 Pa. 311, 314; McKee v. Bidwell, 74 Pa. 218.

The same doctrine has been held in three cases by the Supreme Court of Minnesota.

O'Leary v. Mankato, 21 Minn. 65; Phelps v. Mankato, 28 Minn. 276; Kelly v. Southern M. R. Co. 23 Minn. 98.

The reasoning on which these decisions rest is not weakened by Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 30 Minn. 465, adopted in Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 525, 530, qualified by Salters v. Delaware R. Co., 10 N. Y. Supp. 841.

The pretext for rejecting evidence of this kind is, that the jury might draw unwarranted inferences from it. But that is not a sufficient reason for excluding it. "The evidence should be submitted to the jury, leaving them to draw such inferences from it as they should think they ought to draw."

Nourse v. Henshaw, 123 Mass. 100; Martin v. Towle, 59 N. H. 31; Com. v. Brasley, 184 Mass. 580.

Later acts often give character and color to earlier acts.

Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 111.

It. "Warren v. Spencer Water Co." 3 New Eng. Rep. 503, 143 Mass. 155.

Exceptions; their purposes and effect.

For the purpose of obtaining a ruling by the trial judge as to the admissibility of evidence offered by a party upon the trial, the adverse party takes an objection to its admission, stating the reasons why it is inadmissible. The objection is or should be taken when the party asks a question calling for an answer which is deemed objectionable, or offers in evidence a document which for any reason should not be received. The office of an objection is to stop an answer to a question put to a witness, or to prevent the receipt of a document in evidence until the court has ruled as to its admissibility. An objection to testimony is unavailing if taken after the evidence has been received. See Platner v. Platner, 73 N. Y. 90. After the court has decided that the evidence shall be received or excluded, the party prejudiced by the ruling takes an exception thereto. The office of an exception is to point out errors committed by the court during the progress of the trial. Matthews v. Meyberg, 63 N. Y. 656.

Rulings in the United States Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in numerous cases that exceptions must be actually taken at the trial. And further, that it will review only such exceptions as were so taken. These positions are sustained by the following cases: Pittsburgh, O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Heck, 102 U. S. 120, 25 L. ed. 58; Zeller v. Eckert, 45 U. S. 4 How. 239, 11 L. ed. 979; Phelps v. Mayer, 56 U. S. 15 How. 160, 14 L. ed. 642; Bryan v. Forsyth, 60 U. S. 19 How. 534, 15 L. ed. 674; Barton v. Forsyth, 61 U. S. 20 How. 532, 15 L. ed. 1012; Campbell v. Boyreau, 62 U. S. 21 How. 223, 16 L. ed. 96; Dredge v. Forsyth, 67 U. S. 3 Black. 503, 17 L. ed. 233; Houghton v. Jones, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 702, 17 L. ed. 506; Hutchins v. King, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 63, 17 L. ed. 46; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. ed. 736.

And it is a cardinal principle in the same court that to render an exception available it must affirmatively appear that the rule excepted to affected or might have affected the decision of the case. Florida R. Co. v. Smith, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 255, 22 L. ed. 512.

Waiver of right.

A party to the litigation may waive his right to an exception by omitting to make it until the case is decided.

has been submitted to the jury. Roberts v. Graham, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 578, 18 L. ed. 791.

Exceptions to be available must be specific.

The exceptant, in order to avail himself of the full results of an exception to the admission or rejection of evidence, must specifically allege the grounds upon which he would base his exception. Frier v. Jackson, 8 Johns. 496; Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cow. 622; Whiteside v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 418; Waters v. Gilbert, 2 Cush. 37; Covillaud v. Tanner, 7 Cal. 38; Killer v. Kimbal, 10 Cal. 238; People v. Glenn, 10 Cal. 37; Owen v. Frink, 24 Cal. 177; McDonald v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 13 Cal. 223; Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 637; Voorman v. Voight, 46 Cal. 392; People v. Chee Kee, 61 Cal. 404.

The federal decisions with reference to the subject matter now under review are in entire accord and harmony with the decisions in the various state tribunals, as will appear from the brief consideration of the authority. In United States v. McMaster, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 680, 18 L. ed. 311, it was held by an undivided court that it was the duty of the party excepting to evidence to point out the part excepted to, so that the attention of the court may be drawn to it. If the exception covers any admissible evidence, it is rightly overruled.

Exceptions to evidence must be taken as soon as the court decides to admit or reject it; a note of the exception is then made and it is usually reduced to form afterwards. Bradstreet v. Thomas, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 102, 7 L. ed. 736; Poole v. Fleeger, 39 U. S. 11 Pet. 185, 9 L. ed. 631; Liggett v. Pennsylvania Bank, 7 Serg. & R. 219; Morris v. Buckley, 11 Serg. & R. 211; Stewart v. Huntingdon Bank, 11 Serg. & R. 267; Lewis v. Post, 1 Ala. 66; Chambers v. Baptist Ed. Soc. 1 B. Mon. 215; Gordon v. Ryan, 1 J. J. Marsh. 58.

The exception must be taken immediately upon the overruling of the objection. Griggs v. Howe, 31 Barb. 100, 3 Keyes, 136, 2 Keyes, 574.

An objection to the reception of incompetent evidence must be raised as soon as it is offered; and if a party allows such evidence to be taken without objection, a denial of a motion to strike it out, when the party finds it prejudicial to his cause, will not be a ground of exception. Levin v. Russell, 42 N. Y. 251; Cheesebrough v. Taylor, 19 Abb. Pr. 227.

The proposition is well settled that to entitle an exception to the after consideration of the appellate court when interposed to the admission or rejection

Messa. George F. Richardson, George R. Richardson and Daniel M. Richardson, for defendant:

Defendant's adoption of a particular safeguard at any time, whether an accident had previously occurred or not, could not be deemed an admission that taking any less precaution would be negligence.

Menard v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 886; Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co. 56 N. Y. 1; Swell v. Cohoes, 11 Hun, 626, 75 N. Y. 54; Lafayette v. Weaver, 92 Ind. 477; Hart v. Lancaster & Y. R. Co. 21 L. T. N. S. 261; Cleveland v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 68 N. Y. 810.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under the Statute of 1887, chap. 270, § 2, brought by the widow of Matthew Shinnars, to recover damages sustained by her in consequence of the death of her husband, caused by the falling upon him of a portion of a bank of earth, while he was working tion of evidence it must specifically state the ground upon which the objection is made, and the exception must be at once noted to the ruling of the trial court; otherwise it will not be considered. Voorman v. Voight, 46 Cal. 392; Miller v. Duff, 34 Mo. 167.

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has decided in an early case, the force of which has never been shaken, that exceptions will not be sustained which simply show that incompetent declarations were admitted in evidence. The exclusion of the question is not matter of complaint when it is not shown what the answer would disclose. Hackett v. King, 8 Allen, 144.

The contentions of the text are sustained by numerous authorities, and the Supreme Court of the United States is authority for a proposition that the fact that the party made the point as to the competency or incompetency of the evidence while the jury were at the bar and the court decided it against him, is not sufficient to bring the question before this court. He must show that he excepted to the decision overruling his objection. United States v. Breitling, 61 U. S. 20 How. 252, 15 L. ed. 900.

Where the error assigned is to the rejection of evidence, the specification must quote the full substance of the evidence offered. Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. Clough, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 523, 22 L. ed. 403.

In the case last cited Mr. Justice Strong, commenting upon the failure of the counsel to quote in a bill of exceptions the full substance of the evidence offered, said: "This is to enable the court to see whether the evidence offered is material, for it would be idle to reverse a judgment for the admission or rejection of evidence that could have no effect on the verdict."

Objections and exceptions must be specific as a general rule. Keogh v. Westervelt, 66 N. Y. 636; Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y. 247; Pratt v. Foote, 10 N. Y. 599; Sohle v. Brokhabus, 30 N. Y. 615; Stockwell v. United States, 3 Cliff. 234.

Where the evidence given consists of a number of particulars, and the adverse party excepts to it generally, without pointing out the parts objected to, the exception will be overruled if any part of the evidence was admissible. Moore v. Bank of Metropolis, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 302, 10 L. ed. 172; Elliot v. Peirson, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 397, 7 L. ed. 169; Camden v. Doremus, 44 U. S. 8 How. 615, 580, 11 L. ed. 705, 712.

In the case of the rejection of competent evidence as a day laborer in the employ of the defendant corporation and engaged in digging a trench in Lowell. He died without conscious suffering. The bank was eighteen feet high, and was composed of hard gravel, clay and marl. The plaintiff contended that the fall of the bank took place in consequence of the unreasonable neglect of the defendant to have the bank properly shored up.

At the trial in the superior court, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant; and the case comes before us on the plaintiff's exception to the exclusion of the following question, put by the plaintiff to one of her witnesses, who worked in the trench before, after and at the time of the accident: "What, if anything, was done by the defendant to said bank after the accident?"

There is nothing in the bill of exceptions to show what the testimony of the witness would have been, if admitted, or what the plaintiff offered to prove thereby, and for this reason an exception to the exclusion of the question can-denoe, it must clearly appear on the face of the exception that the evidence was, and not that it possibly might have been, relevant. Cohn v. Mulford, 15 Cal. 50.

If the evidence received by the referee was objected to, and it turns out that such evidence was competent, the rights of the objecting party cannot be in any way affected, because the referee reserved his decision as to its admissibility until the conclusion of the case, and the judgment will not be reversed on that ground. Kerslake v. Schoonmaker, 1 Hun, 423.

Apparent qualification of the rule.

In rare instances an objection to the admissibility of evidence should prevail, notwithstanding its general character in instances where it appears that it could not have been obviated on the trial, as where the subject of the evidence offered by a defendant as constituting a defense does not, in law, constitute any defense. Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 163.

An offer of evidence is intended solely to inform the court what the party making the offer intends to prove, so that it will be enabled to rule intelligently on objections to questions which have been asked. It is not a substitute for testimony; and it is not good practice, except in very special cases, to decide a case upon an offer of evidence. Judges will rarely receive an offer of proof when it can be avoided (Coulson v. Whiting, 12 Daly, 408); nor will they require counsel to object to it; and experienced counsel are rarely willing to rest the case of their client on an objection and exception to an offer of proof. It is much better, if practicable, to receive the testimony which is offered to be given, subject to objection, with leave to the party taking the objection to move to strike it out. See 2 Rumsey, Pr. 297.

The case of Scotland County v. Hill, 113 U. S. 183, 28 L. ed. 692, is chiefly remarkable as embodying the opinion of Chief Justice Waite in reference to this topic. And in connection with the assumptions of the text the pertinency of the following language is apparent: "It is claimed, however, that error cannot be assigned here on the exception to the exclusion of the oral proof, because the record does not show that any witness was actually called to the stand to give the evidence, or that anyone was present who could be called for that purpose, if the court had decided in favor of ad-not be maintained. Hathaway v. Tinkham, 148 Mass. 85, 87, and cases cited; Orowley v. Appleton, 148 Mass. 98, 101; Smethurst v. Proprietors of Ind. Cong. Church, 148 Mass. 261, 267. 2 L. R. A. 695; Farnum v. Pitcher, 151 Mass. 470, 475. As, however, the point of law sought to be presented by the exception is an important one, arising constantly in trials at nisi prius, and as it has been elaborately argued by counsel, we are disposed to rest our judgment upon a broader ground than the one above stated.

The plaintiff contends that where an accident has happened through the alleged negligence of a person, the subsequent acts of this person in taking additional precautions to prevent other accidents are admissible in evidence, in an action against him for the injuries occasioned, for the purpose of showing that such precautions were needed at the time of the accident. If such acts are admissible, it must be on the ground that the conduct of the person amounts to an admission of negligence;

mitting it; and we are referred to the cases of Robinson v. State, 1 Lea, 672, and Eschbach v. Hurtt, 47 Md. 66, in support of that proposition. Those cases do undoubtedly hold that error cannot be assigned on such a ruling unless it appears that the offer of proof was made in good faith, and this is in reality all they do decide. If the trial court has doubts about the good faith of an offer of testimony, it can insist on the production of the witness and upon some attempt to make the proof before it rejects the offer; but if it does reject it and allows a bill of exceptions which shows that the offer was actually made and refused, and there is nothing else in the record to indicate bad faith, an appellate court must assume that the proof could have been made and govern itself accordingly."

The decision last cited merely affirmed and restated a position previously assumed by the New York Court of Appeals, in which Chief Justice Folger wrote an opinion equally conclusive. From that opinion it seems that where testimony is offered which, taken alone, is incompetent, but which may be made competent by other evidence, and this the party offering it promises to produce, the reception of it at the time is not error, and if the party fails to produce the promised evidence the opposite party to save his point must move to strike out testimony before the close of the case. Bayles v. Cookcroft, 81 N. Y. 368.

If the competency or materiality of the facts offered to be shown depends upon other facts, they must also be stated, and the offer must also be made to prove them as well, or it is not error to sustain the objection. Carnes v. Platt, 4 Jones & S. 361.

In order to put the trial court in the wrong, on appeal or writ of error, for rejecting an offer of evidence on direct examination, the offer, as stated in the bill of exceptions, must show the materiality of the evidence which was tendered. United States v. Doty, 8 Sumn. 20; Bank of Pleasant Hill v. Wills, 79 Mo. 276; Jackson v. Hardin, 38 Mo. 175.

The court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, require counsel to state the substance of evidence which is tendered, so as to enable the court to judge of its materiality and relevancy; and a reviewing court will not control the trial court in the exercise of such a discretion. Morgan v. Browne, 71 Pa. 180; McClelland v. Lindsay, 1 Watts & S. 300; Roy v. Tarzee, 7 Wend. 359.

A very accurate exposition of this subject is found in the opinion of Judge Cowen in Van Buren v. Wells, 19 Wend. 204.

The principle is, that a proposal to introduce an and this is the ground upon which such evidence has been sometimes held to be admissible. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315; West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 Pa. 311; McKee v. Bidwell, 74 Pa. 218. And in Dale v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 78 N. Y. 468, it is said by Mr. Justice Rapallo, speaking of repairs made by a railroad corporation immediately after an accident: "In such a case the making of the repairs may be regarded as some evidence that they were needed, and consequently that the road was out of repair." This remark was, however, obiter, and although in accord with some decisions of the supreme court of the State of New York, which we need not further refer to, is contrary to what is now the well-established doctrine of the Court of Appeals of that State, as will presently appear.

The Pennsylvania doctrine was at first followed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota. O'Leary v. Mankato, 21 Minn. 65; Phelps v. Mankato, 28 Minn. 276; Kelly v. Southern isolated circumstance must contain in itself or by reference to something else, either already in evidence or which is offered as yet to come, enough to evince the manner in which it is to be legitimately operative, or it may be rejected. The important branch of nisi prius practice, resting on this principle is sustained by many authorities; but I think it will be found best explained and exemplified by the late case of Weidler v. Farmers Bank of Lancaster, 11 Serg. & R. 184. See also, in connection with this case, 4 Starkie, Ev. 351; Winlock v. Hardy, 4 Litt. 372; Harris v. Paynes, 5 Litt. 106; Wilson v. Bowen, 5 T. B. Mon. 38; Clark v. Beach, 6 Conn. 149; Rowt v. Kile, 1 Leigh, 216; People v. Genung, 11 Wend. 18, 21, per Sutherland, J.; Rex v. Fursey, 6 Car. & P. 81.

These cases contain some very apt illustrations; and the practice was also very well examined in a still later case, that of Davis v. Calvert, 5 Gill & J. 269, 304, and also in Harwood v. Ramsey, 15 Serg. & R. 81, 85. The result seems to be that the court may reject on the ground of the apparent irrelevancy, or may let in the proof in the first instance, and repudiate it if, after all is heard, it shall come short of any tendency to prove the issue. But the better way is to reject it in the first instance, if it come plainly short, as satisfactorily shown by Gibson, J., in Weidler v. Farmers Bank of Lancaster, supra.

When an offer of evidence embraces matters which are admissible among those which are inadmissible, the whole may be rejected. Hosley v. Black, 28 N. Y. 432, 444.

So where no objection is taken to evidence, the counsel must call the attention of the court to the particular portion to which he objects; for if he objects to the whole evidence of two witnesses, the most of which is unobjectionable, his objection will go for nothing. The same rule applies as in offers of evidence or exceptions to the charge of the court. Keller v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 How. Pr. 173; Daniels v. Patterson, 8 N. Y. 47, 51; Elwell v. Dodge, 38 Barb. 336, 342.

The offer of evidence must be specific (38 Barb. 336), and must show how it may be material. First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn F. Ins. Co. 23 How. Pr. 443.

It must appear affirmatively that the evidence was relevant when offered and excluded, that the court erred to the prejudice of the party excepting, the presumption being in favor of the rectitude of the proceeding and in favor of the decision. Van Amringe v. Barnett, 8 Bosw. 357.

Minn. R. Co., 28 Minn. 98. But these cases were deliberately overruled in Morae v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 80 Minn. 465, in an elaborate opinion, in which the question is fully and carefully considered.

Such evidence has also been held to be inadmissible by the highest tribunals in New York, Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois and Iowa. Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co. 56 N. Y. 1; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 N. Y. 151, 10 Cent. Rep. 492; Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co. 51 Conn. 524; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Clem, 128 Ind. 15, 7 L. R. A. 588; Hodges v. Percival, 132 Ill. 58; Cramer v. Burlington, 45 Iowa, 627; Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581. See also Hart v. Lancaster & Y. R. Co., 21 L. T. N. S. 261.

In a recent case in this Commonwealth (Menard v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 386), the plaintiff was struck by a locomotive engine of the defendant at a highway crossing. At the time of the accident no flagman was stationed there, but the jury when they took a view found one there. The plaintiff's counsel in argument proposed to comment upon this fact, and was stopped by the court. On exceptions, this action of the court was held to be correct; and Mr. Justice Knowlton, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The defendant's method of managing its business before, or after, or at the time of the accident was not evidence of what due care required. The defendant, or any other corporation, might at any time do more or less, in some particular, than a reasonable regard for the safety of the public demanded. Its adoption of a particular safeguard at any time, whether an accident had previously occurred or not, could not be deemed an admission that taking any less precaution would be negligence, any more than its use of a more dangerous system would indicate that it considered that reasonably safe."

The plaintiff relies upon the case of Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 874, where the fact that the defendants repaired a platform after

But if it appear that the court assumed a fact in issue as a ground for excluding the evidence offered, it is an error for which a new trial will be ordered. McIntyre v. Clapp, 81 N. Y. 569.

It appears, upon the high authority of Mr. Austin Abbott, that to sustain an exception to the rejection of evidence counsel should make his offer in such plain and unequivocal terms as to leave no room for doubt as to what was intended. If he leaves the offer fairly open to two constructions he cannot insist in a court of review on the construction most favorable to himself, unless it is justly inferrible that he was so understood by the judge who rejected the evidence. Abbott, Trial Brief, p. 49.

If offer is in hearing of jury.

Where the evidence sought to be introduced is of an oral nature, the offer to produce it is necessarily oral, and may be made in the presence and hearing of the jury. Should, however, its introduction be excluded by the trial court, any renewal of the attempt should not be indulged (Scrapps v. Reilly, 38 Mich. 10); and in cases where the proffered evidence is of a documentary character, the court before passing upon its admission or rejection may require its submission to him for inspection.

The principle embodied in the adjudications relating to this subject is ably stated by Mr. Justice Nelson in Gould v. Weed, 12 Wend. 12, decided in 1834. In the course of a singularly exhaustive opinion his honor says: "Upon this offer (of evidence) a question arose on the trial which it may be proper to notice. The counsel insisted upon reading from the stipulation the parts objected to, to enable the judge to understand the question, while the latter requested that the paper should be handed to him, and he would examine it for himself, which was refused. Questions involving the admissibility of evidence belong exclusively to and are to be considered and decided by the court; and we are unable to discover any well-founded reason why the judge should be compelled to hear the counsel read the document objected to, upon this preliminary inquiry, if he chooses to examine it for himself. The only legitimate object in reading it is to put the court in possession of the contents, which is most effectually attained by submitting it to his perusal. Even the adverse counsel is entitled to the inspection of a paper thus offered in evidence, before it can be read, to enable him to object to its admission, if he thinks proper to do so; and it would be strange if the same privilege did not belong to the court when an objection is made 12 L. R. A.

to it. There are obvious reasons why the power thus claimed should be possessed, as the practice of offering inadmissible testimony is liable to abuse, and is sometimes abused when it rests in parol, with a view improperly to influence the jury. The character of the counsel forbids any such inference in this case. We are satisfied, however, that he erred in refusing to submit the stipulation to the inspection of the judge, and that the judge would have been justified in rejecting it solely upon that ground."

A comparatively recent case decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois holds it to be error for the trial court to permit a reading of the substance of proffered evidence, where a valid objection has supervened, and where it appears that it is but a subterfuge for placing doubtful or improper evidence before the jury. Philpot v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 809.

It is a settled rule that where a conversation between persons is offered in evidence, it is the duty of the party offering it to disclose how it may be material, and this was decided by the New York supreme court at general term in an opinion pronounced by Rosecrans, J., which was concurred in by both Justices Ingraham and Leonard. First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn F. Ins. Co. 23 How. Pr. 443.

The case of Miles v. Loomis, in the New York Court of Appeals in 1878, and reported in 75 N. Y. 238, is suggestive as typifying a peculiar phase of the subject under review. In order to secure a comparison of handwriting with a disputed signature, and to conform with the well-recognized rule which requires that the document with the signature compared should already be in evidence, the counsel made an offer of evidence, which was not objected to, and the court all concurred in holding that the failure to object when the offer was made absolutely precluded the party from subsequently resisting the use of the testimony.

Where such evidence is offered and admitted, even under objection, it cannot be impeached by the party offering it and the document is to be taken in its entirety for all purposes to which it applies. Maclin v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 28 La. Ann. 801; Hewett v. Buck, 17 Me. 147, 35 Am. Dec. 243.

Principles contended for in the decisions previously cited have received additional vindication in the case of Carnes v. Platt, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 837.

Mr. Justice Freeman holds that where it clearly appears that the fact is immaterial unless it is connected in a way to bind a party to the action, a an injury occasioned to the plaintiff by a defect therein was held to be admissible as an admission "that it was their duty to keep the platform in repair." This case is readily distinguishable from the case at bar. The defendants were the owners of a building containing a number of shops, each let orally to a separate tenant. The building stood back from a street, and had a wooden platform in front of it, which extended to the sidewalk of the street. The question was whether the landlords or the tenants were bound to keep the platform in repair. The act of the defendants in making the repairs was an act of dominion exercised by them, which the jury might well find was inconsistent with their defense that the tenants were under an obligation to keep the platform in repair. For the same reason the fact that a city makes repairs upon a highway after an accident thereon has been held to be admissible to show an acceptance of the highway as dedicated. Manderich v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 78. See also Sewell v. Co- loss, 75 N. Y. 54; Lafayette v. Weaver, 92 Ind. 477.

The plaintiff further contends that, if this evidence was not admissible in an action at common law, it was admissible in an action under Stat. 1887, chap. 270, because, by § 8, "the amount of compensation, in case of death, is to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the employer herein, or the person for whose negligence he is made liable." But if the evidence is not admissible to show culpability, we fail to see how it can be admissible to show the degree of culpability.

At the trial, after the question above referred to had been excluded, one of the defendant's witnesses testified to the manner in which the bank was shored up before the accident, namely, by placing a plank fourteen inches wide horizontally along the bank, about midway between the top and the bottom, he having observed a fissure near the top of the bank about six feet long and a quarter of an inch wide. He and other witnesses testified counsel's offer to prove the fact and subsequently to introduce proof of such connection may be refused; and such refusal is discretionary with the trial court, and hence, in the absence of manifest abuse, not a pertinent subject of inquiry upon appeal.

The principal case sustained.

The contention of the principal case is fully sustained by a well-considered decision of the New York Supreme Court in 1886, upon a state of facts that bears a strong analogy to the case under review. There was an offer to prove certain conversation, but no attempt to show what it was. The testimony was received under objection; and the case decides that evidence so offered cannot be received under defendant's objection, and that the referee has no right to reserve to himself the power of retaining or rejecting it at the conclusion of the case. Peck v. Yorks, 47 Barb. 181.

The Superior Court of the City of New York has held that evidence cannot be received against the objection and exception of a party, upon the offer of the opposite party to prove a certain fact and reserve to himself the power of retaining or rejecting it at the conclusion of the case. See Clusman v. Merkel, 3 Bosw. 402; Brooks v. Christopher, 5 Duer, 216.

There is an intimation in favor of the same principle in McKnight v. Dunlop, 5 N. Y. 537.

Negligence; precautions after accident as proof of.

The attitude of juridical comment upon this important topic has undergone violent fluctuation and may be regarded as far from settled yet. The argument as outlined in the principal case is doubtless perfectly consistent with many well-considered opinions; but as many eminent jurists have expressed contradictory views it is the province of this note to indicate the tenor and trend of modern adjudication and leave the discrepancies of view for future judgment. The case of Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 465, is chiefly remarkable for a well-considered opinion which overthrew several previous decisions of a singularly able court and established a precedent as far as regards the State of Minnesota, that is at hopeless variance with that in other jurisdictions. In O'Leary v. Mankato, 21 Minn. 65, in Phelps v. Mankato, 23 Minn. 276, and in Kelly v. Minnesota R. Co., 23 Minn. 98, the principle was distinctly announced that the subsequent acts of a party in making repairs and alterations was evidence of negligence; but the 12 L. R. A.

later opinion announced in Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., supra, distinctly repudiates the former rule in the use of the following language: "On mature reflection, we have concluded that evidence of this kind ought not to be admitted under any circumstances, and that the rule heretofore adopted by this court is on principle wrong, not for the reason given by some courts, that the acts of the employes making such repairs are not admissible against their principals, but upon the broader ground that such acts afford no legitimate basis for construing such an act as an admission of previous neglect of duty. A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of his new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards. The more careful a person is, the more regard he has for the lives of others, the more likely he would be to do so, and it would seem unjust that he could not do so without being liable to have such acts construed as an admission of prior negligence."

In reaching this conclusion the Minnesota court harmonized the decision with that of the New York Court of Appeals as reported in Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co., 56 N. Y. 1, in which case Mr. Justice Grover held that evidence of the defendant's acts after an accident had occurred, which were designed to prevent the recurrence of a similar accident, was immaterial. Negligence must be determined by what was known before and at the time of an accident, not from the knowledge that springs from accident itself.

In Salters v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 3 Hun, 338, it was held erroneous to admit evidence to show that after the accident the railroad company changed the character of its switch. Landon, J., writing the opinion, said: "The plaintiff was permitted to give evidence to the effect that after the accident the defendants submitted a target switch for the common one. Within the ruling in Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co., 56 N. Y. 1, this seems to be error. Whether the defendants were negligent was a question to be decided upon the facts as they existed at the time of the injury. What the defendants did afterward was immaterial, unless their acts could be construed as equivalent to their declaration that they were negligent at the time of the injury. But the question appears to be settled by authority and not open for discussion in this court."

In Payne v. Troy & Boston R. Co., 9 Hun, 526, the action was to recover damages for an injury to plaintiff's horse, received while passing over a cross-that they saw no other signs of weakness in the bank before the accident, which was caused by earth falling from below the plank. The plaintiff contends that the evidence excluded would tend to qualify the statements of these witnesses. Without intending to intimate that such would be its effect, it is enough to say that as in our opinion the question asked was, both upon principle and the great weight of authority, properly excluded when offered, if it became competent, in consequence of evidence put in by the defendant, the plaintiff should have offered it in rebuttal.

As we are of opinion that in any aspect of the case the question put to the plaintiff's witness was properly excluded, the order must be—ing upon defendant's track. The plaintiff was allowed, against defendant's objection and exception, to show that shortly after the accident the defendant took up the planks at the crossing and replaced them by new ones. This was held to be error. Learned, P. J., writing the opinion, said: "The only way in which such subsequent acts could bear upon the question would be as an admission that they had been negligent. So a jury would be likely to understand such proof. Yet it would plainly be unjust to the defendants that they should not take additional precautions against accidents, without the risk that these precautions should be construed into an admission of prior negligence. To put down a new plank was an act which the defendants might do for various reasons. Yet it would be easy to argue from that act, to a jury, that the defendants themselves knew that the crossing had been badly constructed, or was out of repair. It seems to me that this evidence was improperly admitted, and that a new trial is therefore necessary."

In Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co., 55 N. Y. 1, plaintiff's intestate slipped from the deck of a steamboat under the outer railing and was drowned, and proof was offered by the plaintiff that after the accident the defendant boarded up the space between the railing and the deck; and this court held that the evidence was properly excluded. Grover, J., writing the opinion, said: "This was immaterial; its negligence is to be determined by what was known before and at the time of the accident."

In Dale v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 73 N. Y. 468, the plaintiff was a passenger in one of defendant's cars and was seated near an open window with his elbow on the window-sill, and while passing over a bridge his elbow was struck by some substance and his arm broken. It appeared that some months after the accident the bridge was removed and replaced by an iron one with trusses that did not rise as high as the window-sill. Testimony was received under objection to the effect that on the new bridge the distance between the rails and the sides of the trusses was greater than the old one. The court charged the jury that they might take that fact into consideration in determining whether the defendants were not guilty of negligence in allowing the old bridge to remain. This charge was held to be erroneous. See the opinion of Earl, J., in Corcoran v. Peekskill, 10 Cent. Rep. 422, 108 N. Y. 151.

The authorities are collected and discussed in the case of Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524, and it was there said: "The fact that an accident has happened and some person has been injured, immediately puts a party on a higher plane of diligence and duty, from which he acts with a view of preventing the possibility of a similar accident, which should operate to commend rather than condemn the person so acting."

The question received consideration in the very recent case of Hodges v. Percival, 123 Ill. 53, and in the course of the discussion the court said: "The happening of an accident may inspire a party with greater diligence to prevent a repetition of a similar occurrence, but the exercise of such increased diligence ought not, necessarily, to be regarded as tantamount to a confession of past neglect."

The rule asserted in the cases from which we have quoted is declared in many other cases. Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co., 55 N. Y. 1; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Dale v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 73 N. Y. 468; Salters v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 3 Hun, 338; Payne v. Troy & B. R. Co., 9 Hun, 526; Cramer v. Burlington, 45 Iowa, 527; Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 59 Iowa, 581; Ely v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., 77 Mo. 84.

Views expressed in the context have been given further expansion by the Supreme Court of Indiana, in a very recent case. Mr. Justice Elliott, writing for reversal, says: "The rule stated and enforced in the cases referred to is the only one that can be defended on principle." Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Clem, 7 I. R. A. 568, 123 Ind. 15. This case contains an elaborate cogent argument for the position it seeks to establish.

A recent Massachusetts case indicates the same view with that delineated in the previous adjudication here cited. The judge presiding at the trial refused to allow the plaintiff's counsel to comment in argument upon the fact that the defendant had stationed a flagman at the crossing since the accident and this ruling on appeal was affirmed by the full court. The court says: "Its adoption of a particular safeguard at any time, whether an accident had previously occurred or not, could not be deemed an admission that taking any less precaution would be negligence." Menard v. Boston & M. R. Co., 150 Mass. 386.

The contrary view.

It remains to consider, the judicial attitude of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, which is in opposition to that of the authorities previously cited. In the case of West Chester & P. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 Pa. 311, the precise question involved in this discussion came under review. The action is for damages occasioned by death of plaintiff's son through the alleged negligence of the company. Evidence was offered at the trial to show that immediately after the accident the defendant company removed its tracks, and Mr. Justice Mitchell, writing the opinion of an undivided court, very pertinently asks, if the proximity of the track to the building did not increase the danger, why was it moved?

1. A series of papers appearing to relate to the same contract may constitute a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, although only one of them is signed by the party to be charged.
2. A written agreement for a sub-lease, "to be made subject" to a lease not yet in existence, but which is to be obtained, is not, for that reason, insufficient under the Statute of Frauds after such lease is obtained in writing.
3. Objection to a variance between a lease agreed upon and the one delivered is waived by refusal to accept any lease.
4. Waiver as a defense for nonperformance of a contract must be pleaded.

(July 23, 1891.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for the breach of an agreement to lease certain rooms in the Boylston Building, Boston, in which a verdict had been directed in favor of defendants. Verdict set aside.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Causton Browne and G. A. O. Ernst for plaintiffs.

Mr. H. W. Bragg for defendant Ritz.

Messrs. W. F. Slocum and W. S. Slocum for defendant Glines.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of contract, brought by the members of the firm of Freeland, Loomis & Co. against the members of the firm of Ritz & Glines, for the breach of an agreement, under seal and signed by the parties, to accept a lease of certain rooms in a building.

The agreement declared on recited that a building was then in process of erection by the Boylston Market Association, on the corner of Washington Street and Boylston Street, in Boston; that Freeland, Loomis & Co. had entered into an agreement with said association for a lease of said building as soon as the same should be completed; and that Ritz and Glines were desirous of obtaining from Freeland, Loomis & Co. a lease of part of said building, "to wit, rooms on the sixth floor thereof, as marked on plan of said floor, in the possession of Freeland, Loomis & Co. containing about 2,500 square feet, more or less, and situated in the northeasterly corner of said building, for the purpose of there conducting the photographing business." Freeland, Loomis & Co. agreed, as soon as the building should be ready for occupancy, and a lease thereof executed and delivered to them, to execute and deliver, and Ritz & Glines agreed to accept, "a lease of the rooms aforesaid, to be used solely and exclusively for the business aforesaid, for a period of five years from the date of the completion of said building, at an annual rental of $2,500, payable in equal monthly installments, the lease to be in substantial accordance with the blank form hereunto annexed, and to be made subject in all respects to the terms and conditions of the said agreement and lease between said Freeland, Loomis & Co. and said Boylston Market Association."

1. The defendants contend that, inasmuch as the agreement provides that the lease is "to be made subject in all respects to the agreement and lease between" the plaintiffs and their lessor, which lease was not then in existence, there is no sufficient agreement or memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, Pub. Stat. chap. 78, § 1, cl. 4.

The agreement declared on is dated April 17, 1888, and it is clear that, considered alone, it is insufficient to satisfy the Statute, for some of its terms were then uncertain and might never be made certain. May v. Ward, 184 Mass. 127; Ashcroft v. Butterworth, 186 Mass. 511. What was then uncertain has, however, since been made certain, as it appears by the report, upon which the case comes before us, that in January, 1889, before this action was brought, a lease, in writing, of the entire building was delivered to the plaintiffs by their lessor.

It is a well-settled rule of law that while the memorandum must express the essential elements of the contract with reasonable certainty, these may be gathered either from the terms of the memorandum itself or from some other paper or papers therein referred to. If one of a series of papers which appear to have relation to the same contract is signed by the party to be charged, this is enough, as all the papers are to be considered together, as forming one contract or memorandum. There is no doubt, also, that parol evidence is admissible to identify any paper referred to. Atwood v. Cobb, 16 Pick. 227, 280; Lerned v. Wannemacher, 9 Allen, 412; Rhoades v. Castner, 12 Allen, 180; Beckwith v. Talbot, 95 U. S. 289, 24 L. ed. 496; Grafton v. Cummings, 99 U. S. 100, 25 L. ed. 866; Ryan v. United States, 186 U. S. 68, 88, 34 L. ed. 447, 453; Peck v. Vandemark, 99 N. Y. 29; Louisville Asphalt Varnish Co. v. Lorick, 29 S. C. 533, 2 L. R. A. 212; Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cas. 288; Fitzmaurice v. Bayley, 8 H. L. Cas. 78, 102; Baumann v. James, L. R. 3 Ch. 508; Shardlow v. Cottrell, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 280, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 90; Strudds v. Watson, L. R. 28 Ch. Div. 805; Oliver v. Hunting, L. R. 44 Ch. Div. 205; Long v. Millar, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 450; Cave v. Hastings, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 125.

The defendants, however, contend that these principles apply only to papers already in existence when the instrument signed by the party sought to be charged is executed, and, in support of this view, rely upon the case of Wood v. Midgley, 2 Sm. & G. 115, 8 C. on app. 5 De G. M. & G. 41. This was a bill for specific performance of a contract of sale of land. Some of the terms had been reduced to writing but not signed. The purchaser paid his deposit money to the auc-ioneer who sold the land, and he signed the following receipt: "Memorandum. Mr. Thomas Midgley has paid to me the sum of $50 as a deposit and in part payment of $1,000 for the purchase of the Ship & Camel public house at Dockhead, the terms to be expressed in an agreement to be signed as soon as prepared." Vice-Chancellor Stuart overruled a demurrer to the bill, on the ground that the memorandum to be prepared and signed was only the fair copy of the draft as settled and agreed to. On appeal, the demurrer was sustained by Lord Justice Turner and Lord Justice Knight Bruce, on the ground that the agreement referred to, although it fixed the price, left other points to be determined. "The conditions of sale were to be adapted to a sale by private contract, and were to be subject to a future agreement." The case is therefore one of an agreement incomplete when made and which never was completed. See also Ridgway v. Wharton and Fitzmaurice v. Bayley, supra; Rumens v. Robins, 8 De G. J. & S. 88.

In Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. 179, the plaintiff and the defendant were owners of a water privilege, with the buildings thereon, etc. The plaintiff agreed to sell his interest, and the defendant agreed to buy it, "at such prices as shall be agreed on and awarded by three men, one chosen by the plaintiff, one by the defendant, and the third by the two thus chosen, which award shall be final and binding on the parties." After the price had been thus determined in writing, the defendant refused to perform his agreement. The plaintiff brought an action for covenant broken, to which the defendant set up the Statute of Frauds, contending that the referees were not named in the agreement, and that it depended wholly upon parol evidence to determine who they were. This objection was disposed of by the court saying that the contract had been performed in this respect. The defendant further contended that the price should have been fixed by the agreement, whereas it was to be ascertained by the referees. But this objection was overruled. The last point decided in this case, therefore, is a direct authority for the proposition that it is no objection to a written contract that some of the terms are to be fixed by something to be done in the future, if that something is done before action is brought; and that, if it is in writing, the provisions of the Statute of Frauds are complied with.

We are therefore of opinion that the Statute of Frauds is no defense to this action.

2. The defendants further contend that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover because they have not performed their part of the agreement. It appears from the report that the plaintiffs on February 11, 1889, sent to the defendants a letter in regard to the rooms in the new building, and in regard to their lease, to which letter the defendants made no reply. There was evidence that duplicate leases were sent to the defendant Ritz about

February 15, 1889; that he afterwards sent one of them to the defendant Glines; that these leases were in the possession of the defendants at the time of the trial; that the plaintiffs had not seen or heard from Ritz after sending the leases; that, two or three weeks after February 15, Glines had called on the plaintiffs and said that he was ready to sign but Ritz would not, and that Ritz would not go in company with him; that neither defendant had signed the lease, or offered to sign any form of lease. Glines, who was called as a witness by the plaintiffs, testified that Ritz declined to have anything to do with him in this matter; and that he, Glines, had said that he could not sign because Ritz would not, as he had not the money to carry it out if he did sign. It was agreed that prior to the bringing of the writ the defendants had said to the plaintiffs that they should not sign the lease, and the plaintiffs might go ahead and let the rooms.

The defendants' counsel pointed out, at the argument, several particulars in which, as they contended, the lease sent to the defendants differed from the form annexed to the agreement. We do not find it necessary to consider these, as we are of opinion that, on the evidence, the jury might well have found that the defendants made no objection to the lease sent them, were not willing to accept a lease in any form, and therefore waived a strict compliance by the plaintiffs with the terms of the agreement. See Gerrish v. Norris, 9 Cush. 167, as modified by Holds-worth v. Tucker, 148 Mass. 869, 875, 8 New Eng. Rep. 499; Brewer v. Winchester, 8 Allen, 889; Curtis v. Aspinwall, 114 Mass. 187, 198; Love v. Harwood, 139 Mass. 183.

3. At the trial the presiding judge ruled that the action in its present form could not be maintained, and ordered a verdict for the defendants, reserving the right to the plaintiffs to move to amend, upon such terms as the superior court might order, if, in the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court, the plaintiffs, upon the evidence, would have a right to recover in any form of action at law, in which event the verdict was to be set aside, and the case to stand for trial. At the argument in this court, no objection was made either to the form of the action or to the declaration. We have not, therefore, carefully scrutinized either. It is obvious, however, that as the contract declared on is incomplete in itself, the terms of the lease to the plaintiffs from their lessor, as far as they are material to complete the contract, should be set forth with appropriate allegations; and that if the plaintiffs rely upon a waiver by the defendants, it should be pleaded as an excuse for non-performance. Palmer v. Sawyer, 114 Mass. 115. Whether the substitute declaration, so called, sufficiently sets forth a waiver need not be considered, as the point has not been argued.

The result is, therefore, that the verdict is to be set aside and the case stand for trial.

RUSSIA CEMENT CO

(....Mass.....)

1. An agreement to prevent competition between two corporations in the manufacture of fish glue under a patent whereby an article nearly worthless is to be converted into one of large value is not against public policy.
2. The invalidity of a patent does not destroy the consideration for a contract, based on its supposed validity, to settle litigation under it and fix the respective rights of the parties, especially where the contract includes mutual covenants as to the conduct of their business and is partly executed before the invalidity is discovered.
3. Specific performance of a contract will not be defeated for failure of consideration, where, after knowledge of the failure, the defendant has chosen to avail himself of the benefits of the contract and to go on under it.
4. The specific performance of a contract to deliver fish skins may be compelled on the ground that damages for failure to perform would be irreparable where both parties are engaged in manufacturing the skins into glue and complainant would be able to procure them elsewhere, and thus continue its business, only with great difficulty if at all.
5. The modification of a contract in details by common understanding and mutual consent will not defeat a right to specific performance if it is still clear what the rights of the parties are under the contract as modified.

(June 25, 1891.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Essex County (Knowlton, J.) for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to compel specific performance by defendant of a contract by which it was alleged to have undertaken to permit complainant to receive from producers a certain quantity of fish skins, needed by it in its business of making glue. Decree in favor of complainant.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Causten Browne, for complainant:

The continuing injury which the bill seeks to avert could not be compensated in damages. It involves the practical destruction of the business in which the complainant is engaged.

Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. 110 Mass. 11; Ballou v. Hopkinton, 4 Gray, 328.

The agreement in the case at bar is clearly legal.

Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 3 New Eng. Rep. 505, 148 Mass. 353.

Messrs. Charles H. Drew and Payson E. Tucker, for defendant:

A conveyance of a void patent, or an interest under a void patent, is not sufficient consideration to sustain a contract, even if both parties at the time the contract was made believed the patent to be valid.

Dickinson v. Hall, 14 Pick. 217; Lester v. Palmer, 4 Allen, 145; Nash v. Lull, 102 Mass. 60; Harlow v. Putnam, 124 Mass. 558.

Where the interest under the void patent is the main consideration of the contract, the contract will not be enforced, although there may be some other considerations for the contract, which would not exist had the invalidity of the principal consideration been recognized.

Bliss v. Negus, 8 Mass. 46; Bierce v. Stocking, 11 Gray, 178.

Where the consideration fails in part after conveyance made the contract may be avoided pro tanto.

Dyer v. Homer, 22 Pick. 253, 261.

The contract is void as contrary to public policy.

Any agreement whose object is to depress articles in the market, or prevent their increase in price by stifling competition, is void, as in restraint of trade.

Gibbs v. Smith, 115 Mass. 592; Phippen v. Stickney, 8 Met. 884; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 187; Arnot v. Pittston & H. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558; *Raymond v. It is against public policy because it enables the plaintiff, if he chooses, to tie the hands of the defendant and stop its works altogether, either by forcing the price of fish skins so low that they cannot be bought, or so high that they cannot be purchased and made into glue except at a loss.

Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 85 Ohio St. 667; Hilton v. Eckerley, 6 El. & Bl. 47.

Courts of equity will never enforce a contract which tends to restrict labor and trade, except in the few cases where it has been held that a partial restriction may properly be made.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and defendant corporations which had been engaged in litigation with each other as to the alleged infringement of a patent owned by the plaintiff, supposing the validity of the patent fully established, and believing that they would be able practically to control the profitable manufacture of fish glue, entered into a contract with each other by which the defendant was to pay a certain sum for damages and one half of the costs of the suits, and to be allowed the use of the patent. Each party was to conduct its own establishment and they were to unite in the purchase of fish skins, an article of which the supply was limited and from which the fish glue is manufactured, so that there should be no competition between them. The plaintiff was to fix the price of all skins purchased, the parties were to have certain places assigned to them by two persons named, of which they were respectively to have the product; from the proprietors of certain other places mentioned the defendant was to have the entire product and to allow the plaintiff to receive from it one third thereof, and the two parties were to divide equally between them the skins which might be obtained from new producers. They were both to sell the glue at the same price, to be agreed upon from time to time, and the contract contained other stipulations, the effect of which was to prevent competition between them. The contract was made in February, 1884. After they had conducted the business in this manner until early in 1887, it became evident to both that the patent was invalid, although no formal judgment was rendered declaring it so. Thereupon, Mr. Brooks, the manager of the defendant Company, made a large number of what are known as the long-term contracts for the purchase of all skins to be produced until the year 1900, with nearly all the producers of fish skins known to the parties. The plaintiff received its share of these skins and no difficulty arose between the two Companies, until early in July, 1890, when the defendant notified the producers of skins by whom the plaintiff had been supplied up to that time not to deliver it any more skins, and notified the plaintiff of its abandonment of the contract. Until then the parties had gone along under the contract as modified by mutual consent, and no intimation had been given the plaintiff of any intention to abandon it. The object of the bill is to compel the defendant to permit the plaintiff to obtain directly from the producers, or through the defendant, what it deems its share of the fish skins. The defendant rests its defense on several grounds. It contends that the contract as originally made was void as contrary to public policy; that it cannot be enforced because, the patent being invalid, there was no sufficient consideration for it; that if it is binding the plaintiff has a complete and adequate remedy at law; that if the plaintiff is entitled to any relief at all it should be compelled to take its proportion of the waste received by the defendant under the long-term contracts with third parties; and, finally, that if the plaintiff had a right to specific performance of the contract it has lost it by reason of its own conduct and the conduct of the defendant to which it has assented since the original contract was made.

The original purpose of the contract was to regulate the business of manufacturing a product under what was supposed to be a new invention on which letters-patent of the United States had been issued, whereby an article then nearly worthless might be converted into an article of large value. The use to which the fish skins were put under this invention gave them their market value.

The plaintiff and defendant sought to unite with each other in the purchase of the raw material, so that they might not be tempted to overbid each other and thus to raise it to an unreasonable price, and also to agree on the price at which the manufactured article should be sold so that they might be secure in a reasonable profit. Even if they hoped for gain by their joint exertions or by the possession of a patent as to the value of which they were subsequently disappointed, their contract had no relation to an article of prime necessity, or to staple commodities ordinarily bought and sold in the market, but to a particular article of which both were manufacturers under the same process, and to an article used in the manufacture which was of little value for any other use; that the agreement was not obnoxious to the objection made by the defendant is shown by the case of Central Shade Roller Co. v. Crushman, 143 Mass. 353, 8 New Eng. Rep. 505.

The next inquiry is whether the contract is incapable of enforcement for want of consideration. If there were no consideration for it but a transfer of an interest in a void patent it would be invalid. Nash v. Lull, 102 Mass. 60; Harlow v. Putnam, 124 Mass. 558.

The parties had been engaged in extended litigation involving several suits. As between them and for that litigation the validity of the patent had been established by a decision of the circuit court of the United States; and a judgment for damages in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant was about to be rendered. An important part of the consideration of the contract was a compromise and adjustment of the controversy which had taken form in the suits then pending and a liquidation of the damages which the plaintiff was about to recover under the decision of the court. Moreover, the parties were competitors in business, and for mutual advantage they entered into mutual covenants as to the mode of conducting their business, and the covenants of each in that particular were a consideration for the covenants of the other. Before the invalidity of the patent was discovered they had performed the contract in part, and what each had done in the management of its business was a part of the consideration for what remained to be done by the other. The belief that the patent was valid was one of the causes of making their agreement, but it was not the consideration of it in any sense in which it can be separated from the other objects and promises which formed a part of the consideration. Both parties are disappointed in regard to a fact upon which they supposed they could rely, but the contract cannot therefore be avoided so far as it is executory when so many other elements entered into it, and when the parties have for a long time been deriving advantage from it, not only in their dealings with each other but with the public.

If it should be held that the right to use the patent formed so large a part of the consideration for the defendant's undertaking that after the discovery of the mistake of the parties in this particular a court of equity would decline to decree specific performance against the defendant if he had seasonably sought to avoid the contract on the ground of mistake, there are reasons why such a defense should not avail the defendant in this case. After both parties knew that the patent was void the defendant still chose to avail itself of the benefits of the contract and to go on under it. There had been no adjudication that the patent was invalid and the existence of the patent and the arrangement under which the plaintiff and the defendant were acting was probably somewhat advantageous to the parties long after they discovered that the patent would not protect them if put to the test of litigation. The report finds that "both parties attempted in good faith to do what the contract called for, and no complaint has been made of a breach of any of its provisions by either of them until July, 1890, a few days before the commencement of this suit." In making the long-term contracts Mr. Brooks, the defendant's treasurer and manager, acted without the knowledge of the other officers of either of the corporations in order that he might make the contracts quickly; but it must be inferred that he intended that the plaintiff should have the benefit of them as well as the defendant, so far as might be necessary to carry out in substance the provisions of the contract existing between them. This is apparent from the fact that before buying the skins of Shute & Merchant, John Pew & Son and Cunningham & Thompson he executed agreement "C" in the name of the defendant corporation, which was professedly a contract for the protection of the plaintiff in regard to the right to purchase skins after the expiration of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, and until the year 1900. Perkins, who was president of the plaintiff corporation, and who controlled the sale of the skins and waste of the above-mentioned firms, would not consent to a sale of the skins unless the defendant would sign a contract for the protection of the plaintiff after the expiration of the agreement, and it was assumed by both parties that the plaintiff would have the benefit of these purchases, and would need no protection during the continuance of the original agreement. "The action of Brooks in buying the skins was afterwards approved and ratified by the officers of both corporations, and the plaintiff has received the skins purchased under some of these contracts, and paid for them at the rate of $20 per ton until July, 1890." The action so ratified and approved must be deemed to have been for the benefit of both corporations, at least until the expiration of their original contract. The conduct of the parties was, in effect, an affirmation and renewal of the contract after the invalidity of the patent was well known. It would be most inequitable to permit the defendant, after having induced the officers of the plaintiff to consent to its purchase of nearly all the skins which would be likely to come into the market for a long term of years, on the faith of an understanding that the plaintiff was to share in the benefits of the purchase, to repudiate the contract, and leave the plaintiff without the means of procuring skins to carry on its business. We are of opinion that if the defendant might successfully have defended against a suit for specific performance on the ground of the invalidity of the patent, if it had sought to repudiate the contract on the discovery of the mistake, it has so far affirmed the contract since that it cannot do so now.

The next objection of the defendant is that even if it violates its contract it is not shown that the plaintiff has not an adequate remedy at law. The only remedy which the plaintiff could have at law would be by a recovery of damages for the failure of defendant to deliver, or to allow those to deliver with whom it had made contracts in its own name but for the benefit of both, to the plaintiff its due proportion of the fish skins. It sufficiently appears that the principal market for them is in Gloucester, that most of the skin producers there are under contract with the defendant, and that the article is of very limited production. "If the plaintiff is unable to obtain skins produced by firms which have contracts with the defendant" it is found that "it will be very difficult if not impossible for it to carry on its business." This continuing injury, leading to difficulties in the management of the plaintiff's business, and possibly to its utter destruction, is one that could not be computed in damages. It would be practically impossible to estimate the amount of the injury or to repair it. The amount of the plaintiff's property invested in the manufacture must lose a considerable but uncertain amount of its value. The injury thus threatened would be practically irreparable. Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. 110 Mass. 11.

It is urged that if the plaintiff is entitled to any relief at all it should be compelled to take its proportion of the waste as well as of the skins, including in the computation the waste and skins of George Perkins & Son. In addition to the fish skins, which were the most valuable product for the manufacture of glue which is left in the business of cutting and packing salt fish, there remain fins, bones, tails, etc., which go by the technical name of waste. A fish glue of an inferior character is made therefrom. As to certain firms with whom the "long-term" contracts for fish skins were made by Brooks, it appears that they would not sell the skins unless the defendant would agree to buy the waste also and pay a fixed price therefor. While the contracts made by Brooks were ratified so far as the purchase of skins was concerned, the plaintiff has neither recognized nor been required to recognize them so far as waste is concerned. The plaintiff does not use waste nor has it been requested by the defendant to take it. The defendant has manufactured this itself, and it does not appear that such manufacture is unprofitable. The business was thus conducted and the plaintiff received its allotted portion of skins from 1887 until July, 1890, when the defendant announced that it should retain all the skins for which it had made contracts. While there has been no formal fixing of prices at which the skins should be bought, this had been substantially arranged between the parties without disagreement, but it nowhere appears that the waste was at any time made the subject of negotiations. In regard to the mode of delivery of the skins, it had been arranged that the plaintiff should receive, as its fair proportion, those contracted for with Tarr & Bro., and with Wanson & Co., paying the producers therefor, the charge being made directly to the plaintiff. It was also arranged that the establishment of Shute & Merchant should be allotted to defendants, the charge for the skins produced there being made by plaintiff to defendant and by it to Shute & Merchant. Nowhere was there a suggestion that the plaintiff should pay for waste, although there was a provision for the sale of it in the contract with Shute & Merchant. We are of opinion that the defendant cannot compel the plaintiff to take any portion of the waste. The conduct of the parties is quite conclusive that there was no bargain between them as to this.

The defendant further contends that if the plaintiff had a right to have the contract specifically enforced it has lost it by its own conduct since the contract was made. It is found that both parties have attempted in good faith to do what the contract called for. The licenses granted by the plaintiff to other parties to manufacture under the patent were assented to by the defendant, two of them by giving certificates under seal, and one orally, by its president and general manager acting in its behalf. The purchase by the plaintiff at one time of four or five tons of extra fish skins in a neighboring State at a price a little higher than they were paying at home did not injure the defendant, and it is not contended in argument that the contract can be avoided for that reason. But in some other particulars the parties have not literally followed the terms of the contract but by a common understanding and mutual consent have modified the execution of it in details. It sometimes happens that by such variations from an agreement the parties leave their rights so uncertain that specific performance of the contract cannot be decreed. But if after changes are assented to it is still clear what the rights of the parties are under the contract as modified, there is nothing to prevent the enforcement of those rights by a decree for specific performance. Even if the agreement were wholly oral it might be specifically enforced. Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 287. Whatever uncertainties and difficulties might arise if the plaintiff sought literally to enforce the original provisions of the contract, the parties have by their acts so applied the contract to the new conditions which they have created as to make it clear that the plaintiff is entitled to have the skins purchased of Tarr & Bro., Wanson & Co. and Shute & Merchant, under the contract as interpreted, modified and applied by the parties by mutual consent and for their common benefit. Of course third parties who have made contracts with the defendant cannot be compelled to act otherwise than in conformity with their agreements. But the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled, and all that it asks for, will be obtained by an order that the defendant deliver to the plaintiff on demand the fish skins received from the three firms named on payment to it of what the skins cost the defendant, so long as these shall not exceed the proportion which the plaintiff is entitled to receive.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Essex County (Devens, J.) for the NOTE.—Doctrine of advancements to heirs.

The doctrine of advancements is confined to cases of intestacy; and perhaps never applies where there is a will of any of the property. Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb. 24.

Upon the naked fact that a father buys and pays for land, and has the deed made to his child, the inference of law is that it is an advancement to the child. Partridge v. Havens, 10 Paige, 618, 4 L. ed. 1115; Sanford v. Sanford, 61 Barb. 299, 5 Lans. 491; Proseus v. McIntyre, 5 Barb. 424; Walton v. Divine, 20 Barb. 9; McClintock v. Loiseau, 2 L. R. A. 816, 31 W. Va. 865.

Where the father purchased land and directed the conveyance to be made to his daughter, who is non compos, also assigning as a reason his wish to exclude certain persons from enjoyment of the property and expressing the opinion that he will enjoy its use as guardian of his daughter, it will be presumed an advancement rather than a trust resulting in his favor. Eastham v. Powell, 51 Ark. 580; McClintock v. Loiseau, supra.

A provision that the legatee's debts to testator should be deducted and balance paid to them, and, if they exceeded the legacies, the surplus to be discharged,—makes such debts advancements. Taylor's App. 5 New Eng. Rep. 268, 145 Mass. 288, citing Hall v. Davis, 8 Pick. 450; Bacon v. Gassett, 18 Allen, 387; Cummings v. Bramhall, 120 Mass. 532; Treadwell v. Cordis, 5 Gray, 341; Poole v. Poole, L. R. 7 Ch. App. Cas. 17.

An advancement is the giving by a parent to a child, by way of anticipation, that which it is supposed the child will be entitled to on the death of such parent. Ruch v. Biery, 9 West. #### Distinction between advancement and gift.

The very act of giving to an heir by way of anticipation implies the exercise of judgment which distinguishes an advancement from a gift, in which no exercise of judgment as to future results is involved. Wallace v. Reddick, 6 West. Rep. 709, 119 Ill. 151.

Where gifts are not expressed or charged in writing as advancements, they cannot be deemed such, under the statute. Ibid.

They must be expressed in writing as an advancement or acknowledged in writing to be accepted as such by the recipient. Long v. Long, 6 West. Rep. 491, 118 Ill. 688; Wallace v. Reddick, supra.

So a deed from a father for an express money consideration and for love and affection is not made an advancement by a recital, in the father's will, that the child has received land, in the view of the Statute which requires the gift to be made in writing. Wilkinson v. Thomas, 128 Ill. 368.

Intention determines whether an act constitutes a gift or an advancement.

The time when the advancement was made is the essential fact in determining whether it applies to a legacy or not. If the payment was made to a child after the will was made it is presumed to be an advancement, and if made to a legatee (who is a stranger) after the will is made it is sometimes an ademption.

W. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants contend that the sum of $3,000 paid by the testatrix in her lifetime to Mrs. Downs should be deducted from the legacy of $10,000 to her. The payment was made several years before the will was executed and cannot operate as an ademption or payment or advancement pro tanto of the legacy. To give such an effect to it would be to vary the terms of the will and to show by parol that the testatrix intended a legacy of $7,000 and not $10,000. Payment of a legacy provided for in a will made by the testator before the will takes effect by his death is regarded as consistent with and carrying out the intention expressed in the will; but to apply a gift made before the execution of the will in full or part satisfaction of a legacy given by the will necessarily varies the terms of the legacy, and allows the intention expressed in the will to be controlled by a different intention proved by parol. If a gift is made by a parent to a child it may be presumed to be an advancement of a portion of the parent's estate which he has given to the child by will, or which the law may give if the parent dies intestate, but if after making such gift the parent by will fixes the portion of the child, the former gift cannot be taken as a part of the portion unless made so by the will. It cannot by possibility be an ademption of the legacy. If it can operate as a satisfaction of the legacy it must be upon other grounds than the right of the testator to adeem a legacy. Paine v. Parsons, 14 Pick. 318; Richards v. Humphrey, 15 Pick. 133; Jones v. Richardson, 5 Met. 247, 253; Hartwell v. Rice, 1 Gray, 597,

Where it is afterwards discovered that the father had made a mortgage upon it, the heir receiving the advancement may recover against the estate the amount of the mortgage upon the land. Polley v. Polley, 32 Ky. 64.

In such case the possession of the son cannot be adverse to the father. Ibid.

The fact that the owner of a tract of land divides it and conveys one part to his son and the other to his son-in-law, taking a note from each for the consideration agreed upon, he keeping the notes separate from the other notes, shows his intention to make an advancement to the son-in-law. *Sadler v. It has been held that a payment by a father to a child will operate as a satisfaction pro tanto of a legacy to the child in a subsequent will when it is received by the child under a promise by him that it shall be so applied. In that case the money is received by the child as a part of the portion to be designated in the will, and it would be fraudulent in him not to allow it in satisfaction pro tanto of the legacy given in pursuance of the understanding. Upson v. Prince, Cas. 4. Talb. 71; Taylor v. Cartwright, L. R. 14 Eq. 167, 176; Fundt's App. 13 Pa. 575; Musselman's Estate, 5 Watts, 9; Kreider v. Boyer, 10 Watts, 54; Rogers v. French, 19 Ga. 822.

The real question in the case at bar is whether it was understood between Miss Jaques, the testator, and Mrs. Downs, when the $3,000 was given by the former to the latter, that that sum was paid and received as part of a portion to be given to Mrs. Downs by will, and as pro tanto in satisfaction of the subsequent legacy.

In the year 1874 Mrs. Downs, then Miss Smith, went to live with Miss Jaques, who was a single woman well advanced in life, as her daughter, with the understanding that if she continued to live with Miss Jaques during her life Miss Smith would be treated as a daughter, and would be provided for in the will of Miss Jaques by a legacy of $10,000. As regards advancements of a portion Miss Jaques stood practically in loco parentis to Miss Smith, and it may be assumed that the rules that apply to advancements and legacies between parent and child applied to them. Miss Jaques made a will about the time Miss Smith went to live with her, in which she gave "To Harriet M. Smith, my adopted daughter, provided she lives with me until my decease, ten thousand dollars." In January, 1876, Miss Jaques made another will in which she gave to Miss Smith "the sum of ten thousand dollars in cash provided she lives with me until my decease." In the same year Miss Smith was married, and after her marriage the $3,000 was paid to her, and she gave the following writing:

"Newbury, Nov. 29, 1876.

"Whereas Miss Anna Jaques has intimated to me that in her will of January 31, A. D. 1876, she has devised a certain sum of money on certain conditions, now being desirous of purchasing a house and land adjoining the same, she (Miss Jaques) has kindly advanced to me the sum of three thousand dollars, by the hands of Edward F. Shaw this day. I hereby acknowledge to have received the said sum of three thousand dollars in advance of and on account of said legacy, and in settlement of said estate if the conditions above mentioned are fulfilled it shall be deducted from the said legacy aforesaid, and I bind myself by this receipt to perform above agreement, to allow the deduction to the executors of the said estate."

This was signed by Mrs. Downs and attested by a witness. Mrs. Downs continued to live with Miss Jaques until her death in January, 1885. In August, 1885, Miss Jaques made a new will which expressly revoked former wills, and contained this clause. "Item 7. I give

A gift to one entitled as a child to share in the donor's estate will not be held an advancement, when it expressly appears to have been the intention of the father that the gift should not be considered as such. De Caumont v. Morgan, 6 Cent. Rep. 385, 104 N. Y. 73.

The recitation in a deed, as to the consideration or execution of a note, is not conclusive that the transaction was a sale and not an advancement. Sadler v. Hufthelmer (Ky.) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 670.

Mining stock purchased by a parent, who caused it to be placed in his name as trustee, for certain of his children, and which he subsequently sold, converting the proceeds to his own use, will not be charged to such children as an advancement, since the gift was revocable, and was revoked by the subsequent sale and conversion by the parent. Herkimer v. McGregor, 126 Ind. 247.

Such a disposition of the property is conclusive evidence of a revocation of the advancement. Ibid.

Ademption of legacy.

Where the thing, debt, security, stock, etc., has been totally or partly sold, transferred or otherwise disposed of by the testator, before his death, there is an ademption, total or partial; and this result is the same even though with the proceeds of the thing sold—say stock, and the like—he purchases others of the same kind which he holds at his death. If the testator, having sold shares of stock, should repurchase the same identical shares, perhaps there would be no ademption. Re Gibson, L. R. 3 Eq. 699; Oliver v. Oliver, L. R. 11 Eq. 506; Watts v. Watts, L. R. 17 Eq. 217; Macdonald v. Irvine, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 101; Castle v. Fox, L. R. 11 Eq. 542, 551; Miles v. Miles, L. R. 1 Eq. 462; *Douglas v. Y. 2, 37; Blackstone v. Blackstone, 8 Watts, 336; Alsop's App. 9 Pa. 374; Whitlock v. Vann, 38 Ga. 562; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 69.

Ademption is a satisfaction of a legacy by some act of testator which is equivalent to its revocation. Burnham v. Comfort, 11 Cent. Rep. 448, 108 N. Y. 535.

The rule of ademption is predicable of legacies of personal estate, and is not applicable to devises of real estate. Story, Eq. Jur. §1111; 2 Wms. Exrs. 5th ed. 1202; 1 Roper, Leg. 365; Davys v. Boucher, 3 Younge & C. 397; Langdon v. Astor, 16 N. Y. 84, cited in Burnham v. Comfort, supra.

A receipt in full by a son of his distributive share in his father's estate, for a sum of money received from his father in his lifetime, adeems a general legacy given him. Cowles v. Cowles, 6 New Eng. Rep. 467, 56 Conn. 240, citing 1 Swift, Dig. 455; Hartop v. Whitmore, 1 P. Wms. 681; Clarke v. Burgoine, 1 Dick. 368; Clarke v. Percival, 2 Barn. & Ad. 660.

and bequeath to Harriet M. Downs, wife of Willard O. Downs, the sum of ten thousand dollars, if she shall survive me, but if she shall not survive me, in such case I give and bequeath the same (ten thousand dollars) to her children who may be living at the time of my decease." This will was admitted to probate. Unquestionably the payment of the $3,000 would have been an advancement of so much of the legacy given by the will of 1876 and an ademption pro tanto of it had the instrument which contained it become the will of Miss Jaques. But the will was revoked, and a subsequent will executed, and the intention of Miss Jaques that the payment should be in satisfaction of a legacy given by the subsequent will cannot of itself be given in evidence to control the plain terms of the actual will. Unless that intention was understood and assented to by Mrs. Downs when the payment was made it cannot be taken as satisfaction pro tanto of the subsequent legacy. The paper signed by Mrs. Downs does not show a contract or understanding that the payment should be in satisfaction of a subsequent legacy. It refers and is limited to the legacy in the will of 1876. The fact that it was understood that Mrs. Downs should have a portion of the estate of Miss Jaques can have no greater effect than to place her in the position of a child who expected a portion. The fact that $10,000 had been mentioned when the relation of the parties commenced as the amount of the portion, and was the amount of the legacy in the existing will does not show that Mrs. Downs in accepting an advancement of a part of that legacy agreed to receive it in satisfaction of an equal amount of any future legacy that might be given to her. There was nothing in the transaction which could prevent Miss Jaques from revoking the legacy and giving a new legacy for any amount she might choose, nor that could prevent Mrs. Downs from receiving the full amount of a subsequent legacy. The writing is limited to the legacy mentioned in it, and cannot of itself affect any subsequent gift.

The only other evidence upon which the appellants rely for proof that Mrs. Downs agreed to receive the $3,000 in satisfaction of a future legacy is conversations between Miss Jaques and Mrs. Downs after the last will was executed. So far as these go only to show the intention of Miss Jaques in advancing the $3,000 they are immaterial, unless they also show an admission by Mrs. Downs that she received the payment in satisfaction of the subsequent legacy. They do not show any such admission. On the contrary, Mrs. Downs said that she was to have the $10,000, and Mrs. Jaques said that $3,000 of it had been paid. The fact that Mrs. Downs made no reply to this cannot be taken as an admission of its truth. She had already stated her understanding of it, and the remark of Miss Jaques was in answer to her. She cannot be held to have assented to Miss Jaques' statement because she did not continue the discussion.

The report does not find that Mrs. Downs accepted the advance of $3,000 with the understanding that it should be in satisfaction pro tanto of a future legacy, and the facts and evidence reported do not show that she received it with such understanding, or that she agreed that it should be so applied. As no contract is found or can be inferred, it is not necessary to consider the further objection made by the executor that the legacies are substantially different. The legacy which

When after the will was made the testator paid the son a certain sum of money, and took from him a writing in which the son acknowledged that a sum of money was received by him in full satisfaction and discharge of the legacies given him in the will, the legacies were adeemed. 1 Swift, Dig. 455; Hartop v. Unless the very thing bequeathed is in existence at the death of the testator, and then forms a part of his estate, the legacy is wholly inoperative; the legatee has no right or claim; the executors are under no obligation to replace the thing by purchasing another one of the same kind as described in the will by means of other assets in their hands, belonging to the estate. 3 Pom. The question of ademption by the death, or destruction, or sale, of the thing devised, or payment of a specific bequest, is not one of intention, but an was deemed in part was to Miss Smith alone and would lapse by her death and was on condition that she lived with the testator until her decease and it conformed to the original agreement between the parties. The subsequent legacy was without condition and included children of Mrs. Downs if she did not herself survive the testatrix. Without deciding that a promise to accept a present sum in satisfaction of a future legacy in the terms of the former could not be extended to the different legacy actually given, we think that it does not appear that the payment was received in satisfaction pro tanto of any future legacy.

(....Mass....)

1. On the destruction by fire of a building towards the erection of which a contractor is to contribute only part of the labor and materials, while the owner is to do the grading, excavating, stone and brick work, painting and plumbing, the contractor is discharged from his obligation and can recover on an implied assumpsit for the value of what he had already done.
2. Advancements to a contractor, made by the owner of a building, may be recovered for failure of consideration on its destruction by fire before completion, although the contractor can set off his claim on an implied assumpsit for the value of what was already done, where he is discharged by the fire and entitled to such compensation because the contract was for part only of the labor and materials.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Hampden County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach by defendant of his contract to erect a building on plaintiff's land, in which a verdict had been directed to be returned in defendant's favor. Verdict set aside.

Butterfield and Byron entered into a contract by which Byron undertook to build an hotel on Butterfield's land according to certain specifications to be furnished him and to have the same completed by May 30, 1889.

Butterfield agreed to pay Byron for the same

$8,500 as follows: seventy-five per cent of the amount of work done and materials furnished during the preceding month, to be paid for on the first of the following month, and the remaining twenty-five per cent to be paid thirty days after the entire completion of the building.

From the specifications referred to in the contract it appeared that Butterfield was himself to do all grading, excavating, stone and brick work, and painting and plumbing.

The time for completion of the building was subsequently extended, and on May 25, 1889, Byron had complied with his contract so far as he had gone, and the building could have been completed within a week or ten days from that time. He had on that date received $5,652.80 under his contract. On that day the building was completely destroyed by fire, without the fault of either party. Byron claimed that the fire was caused by lightning. Butterfield had prior to the fire insured his interest in the building in two companies. They paid the amount of his loss and took an assignment from him of his claim against Byron for any and all sums to which he was entitled by reason of Byron's failure to complete the building, and this action was brought for the benefit of the insurance companies.

After the fire there remained unconsumed some bundles of shingles which had been purchased for the job and charged into the bills, 75 per cent of which had been paid.

Byron took and carried away these shingles, and also the window weights which he found in the ruins. The value of Butterfield's interest in the material carried away was fixed at $38.

NOTE.—Building contract; destruction of building by accident.

If the contract is entire for the performance of a specific work for a specific sum, so that performance is a condition precedent to payment for any part of it, the workman is deprived of all legal right to remuneration if the work is destroyed by accident before its completion (Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 38 L. J. C. P. 831); but if the workman is entitled to payment from time to time as the work proceeds, the destruction of the work before its completion will not deprive the workman of his hire. Menetone v. Athawes, 3 Burr. 1502; Tripp v. Armitage, 4 Mess. & W. 600, cited in 2 Adison, Cont. 552.

So in the Roman law if the builder was employed to build a house and the building was destroyed by an earthquake or by lightning during the progress 12 L. R. A.

of the work, the employer was accountable for the loss; otherwise if there was an express contract, and payment was conditioned on completion of the work. Dig. lib. 19, title 3, lex. 59; Dig. lib. 6, title 1, lex. 39.

Where a contractor undertakes to build a house upon the land of another, and the house before its completion is destroyed by fire without his fault, he is not thereby relieved from his obligation to fulfill the contract. The duty in such a case is to be distinguished from one imposed by law. The obligation to build is founded upon and in his own voluntary contract, and its non-performance is not excused by inevitable accident. Adams v. Nichols, 19 Pick. 275; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. See Addison, Cont. Morgan's Am. ed. 1875, § 827.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is well-established law that where one contracts to furnish labor and materials and construct a chattel or build a house on land of another he will not ordinarily be excused from performance of his contract by the destruction of the chattel or building without his fault before the time fixed for the delivery of it. Adams v. Nichols, 19 Pick. 275; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514; Ingle v. Jones, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 1, 17 L. ed. 763; School Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. L. 513; Tompkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272.

It is equally well settled that where work is to be done under a contract on a chattel or building which is not wholly the property of the contractor, or for which he is not solely accountable, as where repairs are to be made on the property of another, the agreement on both sides is upon the implied condition that the chattel or building shall continue in existence, and the destruction of it without the fault of either of the parties will excuse performance of the contract, and leave no right of recovery of damages in favor of either against the other. Taylor v. Caldwell, 8 Best & S. 826; Lord v. Wheeler, 1 Gray, 282; Gilbert & B. Mfg. Co. v. Butler, 146 Mass. 82, 5 New Eng. Rep. 573; Eliot Nat. Bank v. Beal, 141 Mass. 566, 2 New Eng. Rep. 846, and cases there cited; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 63; Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527.

In such cases, from the very nature of the agreement as applied to the subject matter, it is manifest that, while nothing is expressly said about it, the parties contemplated the continued existence of that to which the contract relates. The implied condition is a part of the contract as if it were written into it, and by its terms the contract is not to be performed if the subject matter of it is destroyed, without the fault of either of the parties, before the time for complete performance has arrived.

The fundamental question in the present case is, What is the true interpretation of the contract? Was the house while in the process of erection to be in the control and at the sole risk of the defendant, or was the plaintiff to have a like interest as the builder of a part of it? Was the defendant's undertaking to go on and build and deliver such a house as the contract called for even if he should be obliged repeatedly to begin anew on account of the destruction again and again of a partly completed building by inevitable accident, or did his contract relate to one building only, so that it would be at an end if the building when nearly completed should perish without his fault? It is to be noticed that his agreement was not to build a house, furnishing all the labor and materials therefor. His contract was of a very different kind. The specifications are incorporated into it; and it appears that it was an agreement to contribute certain labor and materials towards the erection of a house on land of the plaintiff, towards the erection of which the plaintiff was to contribute other labor and materials, which contributions would together make a completed house. The grading, excavating, stone work, brick work, painting and plumbing were to be done by the plaintiff.

Immediately before the fire, when the house was nearly completed, the defendant's contract, so far as it remained unperformed, was to finish a house on the plaintiff's land, which had been constructed from materials and by labor furnished in part by the plaintiff and in part by himself. He was no more responsible that the house should continue in existence than the plaintiff was. Looking at the situation of the parties at that time, it was like a contract to make repairs on the house of another. His undertaking and duty to go on and finish the work was upon an implied condition that the house, the product of their joint contributions, should remain in existence. The destruction of it by fire discharged him from his contract. The fact that the house was not in existence when the contract was made is immaterial. Howell v. Coupland, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 258.

It seems very clear that after the building was burned, and just before the day fixed for the completion of the contract, the defendant could not have compelled the plaintiff to do the grading, excavating, stone work, brick work, painting and plumbing for another house of the same kind. The plaintiff might have answered: "I do not desire to build another house which cannot be completed until long after the date at which I wished to use my house. My contract related to one house. Since that has been destroyed without my fault, I am under no further obligation." If the plaintiff could successfully have made this answer to a demand by the defendant that he should do his part towards the erection of a second building, then certainly the defendant can prevail on a similar answer in the present suit. In other words, looking at the contract from the plaintiff's position, it seems manifest that he did not agree to furnish the work and materials required of him by the specifications for more than one house, and if that was destroyed by inevitable accident just before its completion he was not bound to build another, or to do anything further under his contract. If the plaintiff was not obliged to make his contribution of work and materials towards the building of a second house, neither was the defendant. The agreement of each to complete the performance of the contract, after a building, the product of their joint contributions, had been partly erected, was on an implied condition that the building should continue in existence. Neither can recover anything of the other under the contract; for he has not performed the contract so that its stipulations can be availed of.

*The case of Cook v. McCabe, 53 Wis. 250, was very similar in its facts to the one at bar, and identical with it in principle. There the court, in an elaborate opinion, after a full consideration of the authorities, held that the contractor could recover of the owner a pro rata share of the contract price for the work performed and the materials furnished before the fire. Clark v. Franklin, 7 Leigh, 1, is of similar purport.

What are the rights of the parties in regard to what has been done in part performance of a contract in which there is an implied condition that the subject to which the contract relates shall continue in existence, and where the contemplated work cannot be completed by reason of the destruction of the property without fault of either of the parties, is in dispute, upon the authorities. The decisions in England differ from those of Massachusetts and of most of the other States of this country. There the general rule, stated broadly, seems to be that the loss must remain where it first falls, and that neither of the parties can recover of the other for anything done under the contract. In England, on authority, and upon original grounds not very satisfactory to the judges of recent times, it is held that freight advanced for the transportation of goods subsequently lost by the perils of the sea cannot be recovered back. Allison v. Bristol M. Ins. Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 209, 226; Byrnes v. Schiller, L. R. 6 Exch. 319. In the United States and in continental Europe the rule is different. Griggs v. Austin, 8 Pick. 20, 22; Brown v. Harris, 12 L. R. A

2 Gray, 359. In England it is held that one who has partly performed a contract on property of another, which is destroyed without the fault of either party, can recover nothing, and on the other hand, that one who has advanced payments on account of labor and materials furnished under such circumstances cannot recover back the money. Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 652; Anglo-Egyptian Nav. Co. v. Renne, L. R. 10 C. P. 271. One who has advanced money for the instruction of his son in a trade cannot recover it back if he who received it dies without giving the instruction. Whincup v. Hughes, L. R. 6 C. P. 78. But where one dies and leaves unperformed a contract which is entire, his administrator may recover any installments which were due on it before his death. Stubbs v. Holywell R. Co. L. R. 2 Exch. 811.

In this country where one is to make repairs on a house of another under a special contract, or is to furnish a part of the work and materials used in the erection of a house, and his contract becomes impossible of performance on account of the destruction of the house, the rule is uniform, so far as the authorities have come to our attention, that he may recover for what he has done or furnished.

In Cleary v. Sohler, 120 Mass. 210, the plaintiff made a contract to lath and plaster a certain building for 40 cents per square yard. The building was destroyed by fire, which was an unavoidable casualty. The plaintiff had lathed the building and put on the first coat of plaster, and would have put on the second coat, according to his contract, if the building had not been burned. He sued on an implied assumpsit for work done and materials found. It was agreed that if he was entitled to recover anything, the judgment should be for the price charged. It was held that he could recover. See also Lord v. Wheeler, 1 Gray, 232; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, 517. In Cook v. McCabe, supra, the plaintiff recovered pro rata under his contract,—that is, as we understand, he recovered on an implied assumpsit at the contract rate. In Hollis v. Chapman, 86 Tex. 1, and in Clark v. Franklin, 7 Leigh, 1, the recovery was a proportional part of the contract price. To the same effect are Schwartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18; Rawson v. Clark, 70 Ill. 656, and Clark v. Busse, 52 Ill. 515. The same principle is applied to different facts in Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 411, and in Hargrave v. Cinroy, 19 N. J. Eq. 281. If the owner in such a case has paid in advance he may recover back his money, or so much of it as was an overpayment. The principle seems to be that when, under an implied condition of the contract the parties are to be excused from performance if a certain event happens, and by reason of the happening of the event it becomes impossible to do that which was contemplated by the contract, there is an implied assumpsit for what has properly been done by either of them, the law dealing with it as done at the request of the other, and creating a liability to pay for it its value, to be determined by the price stipulated in the contract, or in some other way if the contract price cannot be made applicable.

Where there is a bilateral contract for an entire consideration moving from each party, and the contract cannot be performed, it may be held that the consideration on each side is the performance of the contract by the other, and that a failure completely to perform it is a failure of the entire consideration, leaving each party, if there has been no breach nor fault on either side, to his implied assumpsit for what he has done.

The only question that remains in the present case is one of pleading. The defendant is entitled to be compensated at the contract price for all he did before the fire. The plaintiff is to be allowed for all his payments. If the payments are to be treated merely as advancements towards a single entire consideration, namely the completion of the whole work, the work not having been completed, they may be sued for in this action, and the defendant's only remedy is by a declaration in set off. If, on the other hand, each installment due was a separate consideration for the payment made at the time, then, as to those installments and the payments of them, the contract is completely executed, and the plaintiff can recover nothing, and the implied assumpsit in favor of the defendant can be only for the part which remains unpaid.

We are of opinion that the consideration which the defendant was to receive was an entire sum for the performance of the contract, and that the payments made were merely advances on account of it, and that, on his failure to perform the contract, there was a failure of consideration which gave the plaintiff a right to sue for money had and received, and that the like failure of consideration on the other side gave the defendant a right to sue on an implied assumpsit for work done and materials found.

The $38 due from the defendant to the plaintiff cannot be recovered in this action. The report and the pleadings show that the suit was brought under an assignment for the benefit of the insurers, to recover damages for a breach of the contract for the erection of the building, and not to recover the value of the shingles or weights carried away from the ruins.

According to the terms of the report, the ruling being wrong, such order may be made as this court shall direct. A majority of the court are of opinion that the verdict should be set aside, and the defendant be given leave to file a declaration in set-off, if he is so advised, on such terms as the superior court deems reasonable.

Verdict set aside.

The presumption in favor of the validity

NOTE.—Judgment; constitutional provision as to full faith and credit.

Under a very familiar constitutional clause, full faith and credit must be given to the judicial process of a sister State. Under legal interpretation this has been construed to mean such judicial determinations as have been rendered by a competent court having full jurisdiction of of a judgment does not extend to a case of personal service on a defendant, who is a non-resident where the proof does not show whether or not the service was made within the State and the order of notice would be complied with as well by service out of as in the State.

(June 25, 1891.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Essex County in favor of plaintiff in a case submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts for its opinion as to plaintiff's right to enforce a judgment recovered by him in the State of New Hampshire against defendant's intestate. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. I. E. Pearl for plaintiff.

Mr. W. H. Moody for defendant.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment rendered against the defendant's intestate by the Supreme Court of New Hampshire was void for want of jurisdiction unless a proper process was served on her in that State. Elliot v. McCormick, 144 Mass. 10, 8 New Eng. Rep. 871; Needham v. Thayer, 147 Mass. 586; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 585; Eaton v. Badger, 83 N. H. 228.

There is a presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of any court of general jurisdiction. Bissell v. Wheelock, 11 Cush. 277; Stockwell v. McOracken, 109 Mass. 84. But it is always a good defense against a suit brought on a judgment recovered in another State to show that the defendant was not a resident of that State and that no proper service was made on him there. The presumption in favor of the validity of a judgment does not extend to a case where it appears from the record that the defendant was a nonresident and it does not appear that service of process was made upon him within the State. Downer v. Shaw, 23 N. H. 277; Morse v. Presby, 25 N. H. 299.

In Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959, it is said that "where the special powers conferred are exercised in a special manner not according to the course of the common law, or where the general powers of the court are exercised over a class not within its ordinary jurisdiction, upon the performance of prescribed conditions, no such presumption of jurisdiction will attend the jurisdiction of the court. The facts essential to the exercise of the special jurisdiction must appear in such cases upon the record."

The facts agreed by the parties and the facts disclosed by the record itself show that the court had no jurisdiction of the defendant's intestate when the order of notice was issued at the February Term in 1878. The record showing that there was no jurisdiction without a service of this order upon her in New Hampshire, the question arises whether the agreed statement shows that the order was served there, or whether there is any evidence in the case which, under the stipulation in the agreement that the ceedings of the courts of a sister State. Under legal interpretation this has been construed to mean such judicial determinations as have been rendered by a competent court having full jurisdiction of court may draw inferences of fact, would warrant the superior court in making a finding to that effect. Unless this question can be answered in the affirmative the judgment must be for the defendant. The order of notice directed a service either by publication, or by giving a copy in hand to the original defendant, or by leaving it at her last and usual place of abode. It did not require or contemplate a personal service in the State of New Hampshire, but treated a service by leaving a copy at her place of abode in Massachusetts, or by giving it in hand to her there, as of equal effect with a personal service within the jurisdiction of the court.

The fact that the order was served "either in New Hampshire or Massachusetts" has no tendency to prove that it was served in New Hampshire rather than in Massachusetts. The return of the officer that he gave the defendant a copy is entirely silent in regard to the place where the copy was put into the possession of the original defendant, and it has no affirmative force in favor of the proposition which the subject matter or the thing without reference to whether they are superior courts of record or inferior tribunals. Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn. 330; Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 433; Taylor v. Barron, 39 N. H. 78; Silver Lake Bank v. Harding, 5 Ohio, 545; Pelton v. Platner, 13 Ohio, 209.

Under this clause of the Constitution, if a decree is enforceable in the State where rendered, it is enforceable in any State (Caldwell v. Carrington, 84 U. S. 9 Pet. 83, 9 L. ed. 60); but it does not give validity to a void decree (Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 214, 6 L. ed. 603; Vanuxem v. Haslehurst, 4 N. J. L. 182); its object was to preclude judgment from being disregarded in other States when a proper tribunal having jurisdiction had rendered them. People v. Dawell, 23 Mich. 247.

This clause of the Federal Constitution is subordinate to one dominant principle, and but one, that is, the principle which requires the jurisdictional status of the court to be clearly shown. A court acting without jurisdiction spreads upon its records a mere nullity. Virginia Public Works v. Columbia College, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 521, 21 L. ed. 637; Watts v. Waddle, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 339, 8 L. ed. 437; Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627-633, 24 L. ed. 858-861; Davis v. Headley, 23 N. J. Eq. 115-121; Nelson v. Potter, 50 N. J. L. 324.

Presumption of validity.

Superior courts are presumed to act by right, not by wrong, and their acts and judgments are consequently conclusive in themselves unless plainly beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunals where they emanate. This is an indirect affirmation of the principle contended for i. e., that want of jurisdiction can be shown. Peacock v. Bell, 1 Sand. 78; Grignon v. Astor, 43 U. S. 2 How. 519, 11 L. ed. 233; Briggs v. Clark, 7 How. (Miss.) 457; Pender v. Felts, 3 Smedes & M. 535; Venable v. McDonald, 4 Dana, 339; Huntington v. Charlotte, 15 Vt. 45; Wells v. Mason, 5 Ill. 84; State v. Kimbrough, 3 Dev. L. 431; State v. Seaborn, 4 Dev. L. 305; Wright v. Watson, 11 Humph. 529; Morgan v. Burnet, 13 Ohio, 535; Pennington v. Gibson, 67 U. S. 16 How. 65, 14 L. ed. 347; Hall v. Law, 2 Watts & S. 135; Foot v. Stevens, 17 Wend. 435; Alderson v. Bell, 9 Cal. 321; Cook v. Darling, 13 Pick. 393; Crane v. Brannan, 3 Cal. 193.

Right of court to inquire into jurisdictional facts.

The tenacity with which courts assert their right to inquire into the jurisdictional facts accompanying a judgment is familiar law. Jurisdiction both over the person and over the subject is always open to inquiry. Lawrence v. Jarvis, 32 Ill. 304.

In the celebrated Dred Scott decision the court went to the extreme of holding that consent even could not confer jurisdiction (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 402, 15 L. ed. 700; Grocers Nat. Bank v. Clark, 31 How. Pr. 123); and where the statute prescribes the mode of acquiring jurisdiction, that mode must be complied with, or the judgment is a nullity. Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 130; Stanton v. Ellis, 19 N. Y. 575; Miller v. Brinkerhoff, 4 Denio, 130; Kerr v. Kerr, 41 N. Y. 372; Winship v. Winship, 16 N. J. Eq. 107.

The attitude of the New York judiciary as to the question raised in the principal case is a faithful reflex of that obtained in other jurisdictions; and until 1813 the courts of that State held that the judgment of a sister State stood on the same footing as other foreign judgments. Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend. 447, and cases there cited.

But in Mills v. Duryee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411, it was decided that a nil debet was not a good plea to such a judgment and that it had the same conclusiveness in every other State as in the State where it was rendered. Since that time, the decisions have been modified so as to conform to that case.

In Shumway v. Stillman, supra, Savage, J., says: "An examination of the cases results in the establishment of the following proposition: That the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, in any State of the Union, is equally conclusive upon the parties in all the other States, as in the State in which it was rendered. This, however, is subject to qualification. If it appear, by the record, that the defendant was not served with process, and did not appear in person, or by attorney, such judgment is void."

If there is no appearance in fact, there is no judgment; it is a nullity.

Since that time, the courts have steadily adhered to this position. In Bicknell v. Field, 8 Paige, 445, 4 L. ed. 497, the chancellor said: "It is at least doubtful whether any court of this State has any right or power to inquire into the regularity of a judgment recovered in one of the superior courts of a sister State, after a personal service of the process upon the party against whom such judgment was obtained;" but due personal service is here made the controlling prerequisite. In both of the cases last above cited it affirmatively appears that jurisdiction is dependent upon the due service of process.

Application of the constitutional provision to the case.

The 14th Article of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States provides that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in recent decisions that, under this provision, it is not competent for a state court to render a judgment in personam against a person who is not a resident of the State, who does not appear in the suit, and who is not served personally with process within the State. It is held that, where property of a nonresident defendant is found within the State, the state court may attach it on the writ, and may proceed to a judgment so far as to apply the property to the debt; but, if there is no appearance of the defendant, and no personal service on him, a judgment rendered against him personally is void, and has no effect beyond the property must be established before the judgment can be treated as valid. Nothing is agreed upon outside of the record from which an inference of fact can be drawn in regard to the place where the service was made, and there is nothing in the record itself which furnishes a foundation for such an inference. If the order of notice called for a service within the State there might be a presumption of regularity in favor of the service although the language of the return was as consistent with a delivery of the copy in Massachusetts as in New Hampshire. But the order assumes that no personal service within the jurisdiction is necessary to the judgment which is contemplated, and would be complied with as well by leaving a copy at the place of abode of the original defendant in Haverhill, or by delivering it to her in hand there, as by a personal service in New Hampshire.

We find nothing in the case to make the stipulation in the agreed statement that the court may draw inferences of fact of any importance. Upon the material point there is nothing but the question, what is the true legal construction of a record, which is always a question of attached, and no suit can be maintained on such a judgment, either in the same or in any other court. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Freeman v. Alderson, 119 U. S. 185, 30 L. ed. 373.

Judgment deemed valid until set aside.

Ordinarily, when it appears that proceedings have been regularly commenced before a court of competent jurisdiction, the principle applies, that however irregular or erroneous the proceedings may be, they are valid until they are reversed or set aside, on motion, if irregular, or on error or appeal, if erroneous. They are in no case to be regarded as nullities, nor to be impeached by plea or proof in any collateral proceeding. Gorrill v. Whittier, 3 N. H. 205; Smith v. Knowlton, 11 N. H. 191; Wesson v. Chamberlain, 3 N. Y. 331; Embury v. Conner, Id. 511; Newman v. Cincinnati, 18 Ohio, 323; Smith v. Keen, 26 Me. 411; Callahan v. Griswold, 9 Mo. 734; Wight v. Warner, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 390; Pierson v. Catlin, 18 Vt. 77; Cook v. Darling, 18 Pick. 393; Kittredge v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 232.

This principle does not intend to exclude any inquiry relative to the jurisdiction of the court, since a judgment rendered by a court which has not jurisdiction is entirely void. Gorrill v. Whittier, supra; Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. 141; Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 464; Barrett v. Crane, 16 Vt. 246; Westervelt v. Lewis, 2 McLean, 611; Swiggart v. Harber, 5 Ill. 364; Boynton v. Foster, 7 Met. 415; Bigelow v. Stearns, 19 Johns. 39; Smith v. Knowlton, supra; Latham v. Edgerton, 9 Cow. 237; Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strobb. L. 1.

Any fact upon which the jurisdiction depends may be denied, unless, perhaps, in the case where the objection has been taken in the court whose jurisdiction is questioned, and it has been made the subject of an express decision of the court. Shumway v. Stillman, 4 Cow. 202; Walker v. Moseley, 5 Denio, 102; Noyes v. Butler, 6 Barb. 613; Hickey v. Stewart, 44 U. S. 3 How. 750, 11 L. ed. 814.

Any fact may be alleged or proved, which goes to take away the jurisdiction; for example, jurisdiction of the person is acquired by due service of the process prescribed by law, or by such notice as the law prescribes, and in the absence of such notice a judgment will be voidable. Wort v. Finley, 8 Blackf. 335; Knos v. Smith, 7 Smedes & M. 85; Gilman v. Thompson, 11 Vt. 643; Clark v. Grayson, 2 Ark. 149; Ford v. Babcock, 1 Denio, 158.

The recent adjudications on this point.

The pith and marrow of this discussion is admirably summarized by Chief Justice Morton in Needham v. Thayer, 147 Mass. 583, cited in the principal case. If the court has no jurisdiction its judgment has no force, either in the State in which it was rendered, or in any other State. This being so, the judgment cannot be enforced by a suit upon it, and the nonresident defendant cannot be deprived of his right to show by plea and proof, if such suit is brought, that the judgment is void, without an abridgement of his privileges and immunities, to protect which was the object of the 14th article of 12 L. R. A.

Amendment. To compel him to resort to our courts by a writ of error, in which he must file a bond if he would obtain a stay of the execution, is to impose a burden upon him, and thus to abridge his privileges and immunities. It has been held, in many cases, that a domestic judgment cannot be impeached by plea and proof in a suit brought upon it, because the proper remedy is a writ of error. Hendrick v. Whittemore, 105 Mass. 23, and cases cited. But while a State may make laws binding its own citizens, requiring them to resort to a writ of error, it cannot so bind citizens of other States.

The case of Martin v. Kittredge, 3 New Eng. Rep. 375, 144 Mass. 13, sustains many affinities with the one under review. The plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error to reverse a judgment rendered in the superior court, in favor of the defendant in error in an action brought by him upon a promissory note against the plaintiff in error. It appeared from the record that the defendant in that action was a resident in another State; that he was not served with process; that the only notice was by publication in a newspaper, and he did not appear; that one Rhodes was summoned as trustee, but did not appear and filed no answer; that the defendant and the trustee were defaulted, and judgment was entered against the defendant on his default. Upon this state of facts, as disclosed by the evidence, the judgment was reversed, the court holding that the principle underlying the law as decided in Elliot v. McCormick, 3 New Eng. Rep. 371, 144 Mass. 10, was decisive of the case.

Extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Field.

As this topic seems enveloped in some obscurity, and as the adjudications upon the exact point in controversy are very rare at the expense of space and in the interest of perspicuity, we quote from the very recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in which Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion: "The State has jurisdiction over property within its limits owned by nonresidents, and may therefore subject it to the payment of demands against them of its own citizens. It is only in virtue of its jurisdiction over the property that its tribunals can inquire into the nonresident's obligations to its own citizens; and the inquiry can then proceed only so far as may be necessary for the disposition of the property. If the nonresident possesses no property in the State, there is nothing upon which its tribunals can act." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 723, 24 L. ed. 569.

This doctrine is clearly stated in Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 19 Wall. 303, 19 L. ed. 931, where it became necessary to declare the effect of a personal action against an absent party without the jurisdiction of the court, and not served with process or voluntarily appearing in the action, and whose property was attached, and sought to be subjected to the payment of the demand of the resident plaintiff.

For an extended review of the authorities, see note appended to the case of Cumington v. Belcher-town (Mass.) 4 L. R. A. 121.

law for the court. We therefore have no occasion to determine whether we should further approve the practice, which has sometimes been permitted, of presenting to the court certain agreed facts as a case stated, accompanied by a stipulation that the court may draw any proper inferences of fact, and then asking the full court to treat as a question of law apparent on the record the question whether the facts agreed will warrant an inference of fact that will support the judgment appealed from, on the assumption, without proof, that the court below drew the strongest inferences of fact possible in favor of the result reached. It is clear that such a statement is not like a special verdict, and is not a proper case stated, because it can never be known from the record whether the court below drew any inferences of fact or not. If it is desired to present to the full court the question of law whether the facts agreed will warrant a particular inference of fact, it can best be done by an exception taken at the hearing. See Mayhew v. Duffee, 138 Mass. 584; Old Colony R. Co. v. Wilder, 187 Mass. 586; Hecht v. Batcheller, 147 Mass. 835, 839, 6 New Eng. Rep. 610; Fitzsimmons v. Carroll, 128 Mass. 401; Charlton v. Donnell, 100 Mass. 229; Kee-gan v. Cox, 116 Mass. 289; West v. Platt, 120 Mass. 421; Atlantic Nat. Bank v. Harris, 118 Mass. 147; Powers v. Provident Sav. Inst. 122 Mass. 443; Hovey v. Crane, 10 Pick. 440; Com. v. Cutter, 18 Allen, 393.

In deciding the case on the ground that the plaintiff has failed to show that service was made in New Hampshire we do not intimate that the court there had jurisdiction, in the absence of a valid attachment of property, to issue a process requiring the defendant to answer in that State, or that the judgment would be good if service of the order had been made there.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

COLUMBUS & HOCKING COAL & IRON CO., Plff. in Err.,
v.

John H. TUCKER.

(48 Ohio St. —.)

* In an action brought by a riparian owner to recover of a mining company damages to his lands, and for polluting the water of a stream which runs through them, by depositing on its own lands coal slack, dirt, and refuse, in places from which the same had been washed down and onto the lands of plaintiff, the evidence showing substantial injury to have been produced thereby; that the deposits were made intentionally; and that such result might, at the time the deposits were made, have been anticipated by a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence,—a right to recover is established; and it is not a defense to show that the operation of the mines, and the deposit and disposal of the slack, etc., was conducted in the mode in general practice in the operation of similar coal mines in the surrounding mining districts, and that such deposits were made without malice, and upon the only feasible place or places the company could deposit the same, and carry on the business of mining coal.

NOTE.—Damages for pollution of water of stream.*

If one carries on a lawful trade or business in such a manner as to prove a nuisance to his neighbor, he must answer in damages therefor. See note to Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Co. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 711.

Where the cause of action is the pollution of a watercourse by water from a coal mine, and where the injury was caused by a combination of mine water which flowed naturally from the mines, which was damnum absque injuria, and water pumped from the mines, if, as to the latter there would be a liability for injury inflicted, where the injury is estimated without distinguishing between these sources, the judgment will be reversed. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hocking County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted to plaintiff's land and for the pollution of the waters of a certain stream by reason of the deposit by defendant on its own land of slack, dirt and refuse from its coal mines. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

For an understanding of the points decided, the following statement of facts will be found sufficient:

On April 24, 1886, John H. Tucker, defendant in error, commenced an action in the Court of Common Pleas of Hocking County against the Columbus & Hocking Coal & Iron Company, seeking to recover damages for injury to his lands by reason of the acts of the Company. Among other things, the petition alleged that the defendant is an Ohio corporation; that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land through which flows a stream called "Monday Creek," whose channel, prior to the wrongs complained of, had always been sufficient to hold and carry the water of the stream, except during unusual freshets. On the 1st day of March, 1883, and continuously thereafter, the defendant was and had been cur. Ch. J., Gordon and Trunkey, JJ., dissenting. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 4 Cent. Rep. 475, 113 Pa. 126.

The right to mine coal is a right incident to the ownership of coal property; and, when exercised in the ordinary manner and with due care, the owner cannot be held liable in damages to a riparian owner for permitting the natural flow of mine water over his own land into the watercourse, the result being a mere personal injury, not affecting the community. Ibid.

the owner and operator of large coal mines situated along Sugar Run, and its tributaries, which run empties into Monday Creek above and near plaintiff's lands. Since the above date defendant has continually and intentionally thrown and deposited, and knowingly permitted to remain, the coal dirt, coal slack and coal refuse from its mines, in large heaps upon the immediate banks of said run and its tributaries, in such manner and with the purpose that the same should, during rains and freshets, be washed into said streams, and carried away thereby. Said slack, dirt and refuse was, during the time mentioned, carried by Sugar Run and its tributaries into and along Monday Creek, filling up the channel thereof through plaintiff's farm, causing Monday Creek to overflow its banks, inundating plaintiff's lands, covering about seven acres thereof with slack and refuse, and rendering it valueless; also destroying a valuable spring, rendering about nine acres of the lands swampy and unhealthy, and befouling and poisoning the water in Monday Creek, thus rendering it unfit for stock. The defendant, by answer, denied that it deposited its slack and other refuse on the margin of Sugar Run, or in any other place, or permitted the same to remain on the bank of said stream, for the purpose of having it washed away by the stream. It denied specifically the allegations of damage to plaintiff by reason of the coal slack and other refuse. It averred that the mining at and operation of the mines, and the deposit and disposal of the slack and all refuse, was conducted in a prudent and careful manner, and in the mode in general practice in the operation of all similar coal mines in the Hocking Valley and the surrounding mining districts near thereto, without malice or negligence, but with due regard to plaintiff's legal rights; and the deposits were made upon its own lands, and upon the only feasible places it possibly could deposit the same, and carry on the business of mining coal. Plaintiff, for reply, denied that the deposits were made in a careful and prudent manner, and without negligence, and that the deposits were made in the only feasible places compatible with carrying on the business of mining coal. At the trial the defendant offered to prove "that the mines were properly located; that the operation of them was properly conducted; that the coal slack was deposited upon the land of the Company without malice or negligence, in the ordinary way in common usage in the mining regions of the Hocking Valley and its surroundings, and in the only possible and feasible way that the defendant could deposit the same." Objection to this was sustained, to which defendant excepted.

In varying forms of expression the defendant requested the court to charge the jury that the defendant was a corporation duly empowered by its charter to mine coal, and the power to mine coal carried with it the power to do all things made necessary by the natural conformation of the land, or whatever else is included in the reasonable and proper use of mining lands. So that, if the jury should find that the defendant has confined itself to the necessary means of the lawful enjoyment of its lands; that it deposited its coal slack from its mines on its own lands, upon the only feasible place or places it could possibly deposit the same, taking into account the natural conformation of the land where the coal banks were located, and the slack was deposited in order to carry on its business of mining coal, and that the deposits were made without malice or negligence, and without intent to have it carried away by water,—then there can be no recovery. The court declined to charge as requested, but did charge, among other things, as follows: "The first principal question that will demand your attention is whether or not the defendant intentionally threw and deposited, and permitted to be thrown and deposited, the coal dirt, slack and refuse from its coal mines into Sugar Creek, or in the immediate vicinity of such creek, with the purpose and intention of having the same, by operation of rain falling upon it, wash into the said creek. This is averred in the petition, and denied in the answer; and before the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict at your hands he must satisfy you, by preponderance or greater weight of the evidence, of the truth of such averment. If he shall fail to satisfy you of the truth of this averment, that will be an end of your labors, for in that event your verdict must be for the defendant, for, though the defendant says in its answer that it was guilty of no negligence or carelessness in the operation of its coal mines, and deposited its slack upon the only feasible place for its deposit, etc., and this is denied in the reply, yet the plaintiff can only recover because of the fact of his petition; and the only wrong conduct complained of in the petition is this intentional deposit of slack, etc., into the stream, or in such proximity thereto that it was intended it should wash in said creek; and it is for the consequence of this wrongful conduct upon the part of the defendant that the plaintiff may recover. . . . The question that you have to deal with is as to whether the defendant, during the time complained of in the petition, did the acts therein charged, and whether injuries resulted to the plaintiff's land therefrom. You will observe the defendant must have intentionally, during the time complained of in the petition,—March 1, 1888, to April 24, 1888, the date of filing the petition,—deposited this slack or refuse from its mines in this creek, or at some place that it would naturally and necessarily be carried into said creek, or it must have intentionally permitted the same to be done. And by 'permission' here is meant that, having the power and control over the operation of said mines, and knowing said slack and refuse was being so deposited, failed and neglected to prevent the same. Where the slack and refuse is not thrown or deposited directly in the creek, but at a place where it is claimed it will be washed into such stream, the defendant's intention must be gathered from the circumstances under which the same was deposited. One is presumed to have intended the natural consequence of his act purposely done; and if this slack or refuse was deposited at such a place by the defendant that it must naturally and necessarily be washed into the creek or stream, the intention that it would be so washed must be presumed. This is a practical question, and the defendant must be held to the exercise of care and caution in the deposit of its slack, to avoid its being washed into the stream; and that is such care and caution that a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence, desirous of preventing such slack being washed into said stream, would exercise in making such deposits; and if it could not be deposited upon said land without its being necessarily washed in the stream, as must be apparent to any man of ordinary intelligence, then it was the duty of the defendant not to cause its deposit upon said land. Upon the other hand, the defendant cannot be held liable for any unusual result, or one that would not be anticipated by a man exercising ordinary intelligence, while depositing the slack upon his own land; and if injury resulted from such deposit to another, it must be held an accident for which the defendant is not responsible. So you will look into this testimony, and determine: Did the defendant deposit, or permit to be deposited, the slack and refuse from its coal mines in this stream, or did it deposit such slack and refuse at some place or places, whether upon its own land or elsewhere, from which it was its legal duty to know that such slack and refuse would be washed into the stream, and was such slack and refuse washed from thence into the stream? To which refusals, and to the charge as thus given, the defendant excepted.

A verdict having been given for the plaintiff, and judgment rendered thereon, error was prosecuted to the circuit court, where the judgment was affirmed. To reverse these judgments the present proceeding in error is prosecuted.

Section 6925, Rev. Stat., makes the acts and doings of the defendant below, as charged in the petition in the court of common pleas, criminal. Plaintiff has a right of action against the wrong-doer, in addition to the remedy the State has by indictment and punishment.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are admonished that the case is one of great practical importance. In view of this consideration, the counsel favored the court with able and elaborate argument, and the oral argument has been supplemented by intelligent and exhaustive briefs, presenting the question in a very full and comprehensive manner. We agree that the case is an important one, and, recognizing this, the court has given to it full and patient consideration. We think, nevertheless, that the real issue is narrowed by the pleadings to a small compass, and may be determined by the application of simple and well-settled rules of law. By its answer, the Company denied that the deposits of slack and refuse were made or permitted with the purpose of having them washed down onto plaintiff's lands, and denied negligence; but did not deny that it made the deposits and permitted them to remain at the places in the petition charged, or that they were deposited in such manner as that they would be and were carried away by the streams. In the view of the trial court, therefore, there was practically but one question for the jury to pass upon in determining the liability of the Company in case damages were proved as the result of the defendant's acts, and plaintiff's own acts did not prevent a recovery, and that was whether or not, in making and continuing the deposits, the Company's managers knew, or ought, as reasonable men, to have known, that they would be washed down by the streams and thus injure the plaintiff. It is fundamental, we presume, that an owner of land has the right to enjoy the soil itself, in its natural state, unaffected by the tortious acts of a neighboring landowner; and where the land is located along the margin of a stream he is, as a riparian owner, entitled, as an incident to his estate, to the natural flow of the water of the stream in its accustomed channel, undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality, except where his estate is servient to one which dominates it, and except as to injury which may be done to it by one in the performance of an act lawful in itself, and done in a manner which does not involve malice or negligence. Washb. Easem. 4th ed. p. 816; Johnson v. Jordan, 2 Met. 284.

This was the position of plaintiff as to his land on Monday Creek, and as to the waters of that stream. It is not claimed that the plaintiff's land is, in any legal sense, servient to that of the Coal Company. But, broadly stated, the claim of the Company is that, being a corporation authorized to mine coal in the State, and owning the lands upon and in which its mines are situate, and conducting a business which is of great importance to the public as tending to develop the natural resources of the country, it has the right to place its slack and refuse upon the surface of its own land at such points as is necessary for its convenience in the carrying on of its current and future mining operations; and that, if it makes such deposits carefully, without malice, but solely with a view to the reasonable and successful mining of its coal, this is no more than is warranted by the common usage of other coal companies and operators of the Hocking Valley and that section of the State, and is but a lawful and proper use of its own lands; and, although the slack and refuse so deposited in the ordinary course of things may, when placed there, be expected to wash down and finally reach the lands of the plaintiff, to his damage, yet it is damnum absque injuria, and there can be no recovery. Of course the right of the Coal Company, as a landowner, to the natural and full use of its soil is measured by the same rule as that applied to the like right of the plaintiff. But the right it insists upon is something different from the natural and ordinary use of the soil. While not an unusual one, perhaps, with those engaged in the same business in the locality, it is an exceptional rather than a common and ordinary one. It is not incidental to the use of the soil itself as such; indeed, is destructive of what is the most common use of the soil, viz., for agricultural purposes. Yet it is not necessarily an improper or unlawful use. Whether it is so or not depends upon the circumstances. The course of business is to take the coal in a body from the inside of the mines to the surface, there screen it, and dump the slack and refuse on i's own land, but in such places that, owing to the conformation of the ground, it may be carried down the tributaries, and into Monday Creek. If the Company may lawfully do this, even though the probable and natural effect, known to the Company's managers at the time, is that the deposits will wash down onto and injure the plaintiff's lands, or pollute the water of Monday Creek, then there can be no recovery, and the judgment below should be reversed.

That the Coal Company is a corporation can make no difference in the case. Its rights are just as great, and no greater, than those of a private person in the same business. That it is authorized by its charter to mine coal generally in the State cannot enlarge its rights in any particular locality. Even had its charter empowered it to establish a business and carry it on in a particular place, it cannot be presumed that the State has intended to authorize it to carry on the business in a manner destructive of the property rights of others without compensation. While the thing to be done may be lawful in a general way, there are and must be limitations upon the means by which it is to be done. Nor is it of consequence that the operation of the Company's mines tends to the development of the natural resources of the country. But few enterprises, the product of which is useful, fail to advance the general good. Along with many evils attending the working of this class of organizations, valuable services have been rendered to the public by them, and many comforts and necessities are afforded the people by them which the capital of single individuals would be inadequate to produce. At the same time they are not, in the eye of the law, public enterprises, but, on the contrary, are organized and maintained wholly and entirely for private gain; and so soon as gain ceases to follow their operation, just so soon do the operations themselves cease.

Equally immaterial, as we think, is the matter of custom among coal operators in the Hocking Valley and the surrounding mining districts near thereto of depositing slack and refuse on their own lands, when such custom is invoked to justify deposits so placed as to naturally allow them to wash down to the injury of lands lying below them. The rights of the plaintiff to the uninterrupted use of his land, and the unimpaired use of the water of Monday Creek, being secured to him by the common law, how is it possible that a custom can deprive him of them? Why should a usage, the effect of which, if recognized, is to permit one man to take from another his property rights without compensation, be sanctioned? If it be assumed that the custom is a general one, then it is a part of the common law itself; and there would be presented an instance of two rules of law, equally binding, and yet wholly inconsistent the one with the other. If it be claimed that the custom is a particular one, then we have the anomaly of a landowner's common-law right in his land taken from him by a usage of a particular trade, established by strangers, which it is not pretended he has ever been cognizant of, much less assented to. To have affected the plaintiff the custom must have been shown to be reasonable and certain, known to him, or to have been so general and well established that knowledge would be presumed, peaceably acquiesced in, and not unjust, oppressive, or in conflict with an established rule of public policy. The alleged custom possessed scarcely one of these attributes. Even though it had been common throughout the State, it would not avail. A usage which is not according to law, though universal, cannot be set up to control the law. Meyer v. Dresser, 16 C. B. N. S. 646; Stocser v. Whitman, 6 Binn. 416; Inglebright v. Hammond, 19 Ohio, 837. Nor could the testimony offered avail the defendant on the question of negligence. Evidence of a particular custom is sometimes admitted to explain a contract, to ascertain the intention of the parties when it has not been fully expressed in the contract, to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intentions and acts of the parties, or to show that the mode in which a contract has been performed is the one customarily followed by others engaged in the same calling or trade; but, as a general proposition, one "charged with negligence will not be allowed to show that the act complained of was customary among those engaged in a similar occupation, or those placed under like circumstances, or owing similar duties. Such an offer is, in effect, to show, as an excuse for defendant's negligence, a custom of others to be equally negligent." Deering, Neg. § 9; Cleveland v. New Jersey Steam-Boat Co. 5 Hun, 523; Judd v. Fargo, 107 Mass. 264; Hinckley v. Barnstable, 109 Mass. 126; Miller v. Pendleton, 8 Gray, 547; Basley v. New Haven & N. Co. 107 Mass. 496; Littleton v. Richardson, 33 N. H. 59; Sewall's Falls Bridge Co. v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 171; Crocker v. Schureman, 7 Mo. App. 858.

That others engaged in like business have been accustomed to disregard the rights of their neighbors can furnish no justification to the defendant to do so.

The further claim of the Company that it had the right to make the deposits in the places complained of because it was necessary to the successful conduct of its own business to so place them, seems no less wanting in substance. The effect is to measure the rights of the plaintiff in his lands and in the waters of Monday Creek by the convenience or necessity of the Company's business. An owner of land in Ohio is not subject to any such narrow and arbitrary rule. If the injury complained of were merely a fanciful wrong, or produced simply personal discomfort, such as any dweller in a town is necessarily subjected to by reason of the operations of trade which may be there carried on, and which are actually necessary, not only for the enjoyment of property, but for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town and the public at large, there might be no real ground of complaint; but where the result of the acts of one on his own land is a direct and material injury to the property and property rights of another, a very different question arises, and, in such case, the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas applies. Upon reason we think the proposition sound that, where no right by prescription exists to carry on a particular business in a particular manner at a particular place, and the natural and necessary result of the place selected and the manner adopted is to cause material injury to the property rights of another, it is not a sufficient defense to an action for damages to show that the locality where it is carried on is one generally in use by persons in such business, and the manner in which it is carried on is commonly adopted by others in such business, even though it appears that the use made of the land, while not the common and ordinary use of land as such; is not an unnatural nor improper one in and of itself, nor even an unusual one; and the proposition will be found sustained by abundant authority.

From the scores of cases we are content to cite Tipping v. St. Helen's Smelt. Co., 4 Best & S. 608, 615, 11 H. L. Cas. 642; Barnford v. Turnley, 3 Best & S. 62, 82. In the latter case defendant was the owner of land on which was clay well adapted to the making of brick. He dug the clay, moulded it, and proceeded to burn it on the land, to the damage of the plaintiff. The court held that an action for a nuisance would lie. Attention is specially called to the opinion of Bramwell, B. Attention is also called to Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, §§ 783, 784. "It is a general principle that any person who, without authority, diverts the whole or any part of the water of a stream from its natural course, or interferes with its natural current, is responsible absolutely, and without any question of negligence, to anyone who is entitled to have the water flow in its natural state." "Any use of the land near a stream, or of the water of a stream itself, which renders the water unwholesome, offensive or unfit for the purposes for which it is used, is unlawful; and any riparian owner who is damaged by such unlawful acts has an action for his damages against the author of the wrong." If this view of the law be correct, it is clear that the question as to the Company's liability, in case damages were proved as the result of the defendant's acts, and the plaintiff's own conduct did not prevent a recovery, was, as held by the trial court, merely a question whether or not, in making and continuing the deposits, the Company's managers knew, or ought to have known, as reasonable men, that the deposits would be washed down by the stream, and might injure the plaintiff. No obstacle was placed by the court to the making of proof by the Company touching this point. The offer of proof in regard to negligence did not embrace this idea, however, and was therefore too general to be of service to the jury. Besides this, it embraced propositions as to matters wholly immaterial, as heretofore shown. It was not error, therefore, to exclude the testimony. For like reasons there was not error in refusing to charge as requested. Some of the propositions embraced correct principles of law in the abstract, but were not, as stated, wholly applicable to the case made, and might have been misleading, inasmuch as they were in the line of the defendant's theory of the case, which, we think, was wrong. Nor was there error in the charge as given. The rule given the jury as to negligence was in strict consonance with the doctrine laid down by this court in Crawford v. Rambo, 44 Ohio St. 279, 4 West. Rep. 445. It is there held that "where a riparian owner constructs an embankment upon his own lands that occasions substantial injury to the lands of a neighbor upon the stream, and which might, at the time, have been anticipated by a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence, he is liable in damages for the injury as occasioned." The rule, we think, applies to the case at bar.

The case of Rugner v. Cincinnati H. R. Co., 34 Ohio St. 96, is cited as sustaining the Company's claim. With due respect, we think it fails to do so. The question was whether, where a railroad company is authorized to propel its trains and operate its road by steam locomotives, an inference of negligence arises from the mere fact that an injury to adjoining property was caused by sparks emitted by such locomotives, which question the court answered in the negative. The railroad company was authorized by the State to construct its railroad and operate it by locomotives, and the only way by which it was possible for the locomotives to be driven was by the creation of steam by means of fire, and sparks would necessarily follow. It was not only the natural and common way, but the only practical way. Negligence must be shown; it will not be presumed. Hence, when the only fact present was that sparks had been emitted from the smoke-stack, which caused damage, the court would not infer that the fire was carelessly conducted, nor that the appliances of the railroad company were defective. But whether or not, at common law, the action could be maintained, there seems to be no question but that the acts charged against the defendant company, if done intentionally, constituted a nuisance punishable by the criminal statute, and that a right of action on the part of a person injured would follow. By the Act of April 15, 1857 (1 Swan & C. Stat. 880), "the obstructing or impeding, without legal authority, the passage of any navigable river, harbor or collection of water; or the corrupting or rendering unwholesome or impure any watercourse stream or water; or unlawfully diverting any such watercourse from its natural course or state, to the injury or prejudice of others,"—was declared a nuisance, made punishable by fine, and a right of action given to any person injured for civil damages. The Act of March 27, 1876 (73 Ohio Laws, 87), provided "that if any person or persons shall intentionally throw or deposit, or permit to be thrown or deposited, any coal dirt, coal slack, coal screenings, or coal, or other refuse from coal mines, into or upon any of the rivers, lakes, ponds, streams, or any place adjacent to the same, from which such coal dirt . . . will wash into any of the rivers, lakes, ponds or streams of this State, every such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined," etc., "and shall moreover be liable to the party or parties injured in treble the amount of damages by him, her, or them sustained." This Act was codified the following year, and made part of the Penal Code (74 Ohio Laws, 364), under the head of "Nuisances," and is section 7 of that chapter. In this codification, which is now, in substance, section 6925 of the Revised Statutes, the provision for treble damages is omitted. It does not follow, however, that civil damages may not be recovered. The acts charged in this case against the

Company came within the statutory definition of "nuisances." This legislation shows a legislative intent to give the injured party a civil action. But, aside from this, it is settled law, we presume, that for injuries arising from a nuisance the injured party may have an action. Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts (2d ed. p. 790), says: "It is sufficient to say of the authorities that they recognize the rule as a general one that, when the duty imposed by statute is manifestly intended for the protection and benefit of individuals, the common law, when an individual is injured by a breach of the duty, will supply a remedy if the Statute gives none." See also cases cited, and Cardington v. Fredericks, 46 Ohio St. 442. If, therefore, the evidence showed that the Statute had been intentionally violated, a statutory nuisance was shown to have been committed, and those engaged in producing it would be liable. Let it be assumed that the Company, on account of its artificial character, could not be indicted and punished, yet the persons in its employ who did the acts could be held both criminally and civilly; and, whenever the acts of an employé are such as to make him liable personally, the employer, whether a natural person or a corporation, may be held civilly where it is shown that the acts of the employé were performed in the line of his duty. So that, in this case, if the acts done would have rendered the employé amenable to the criminal statute, no rule of law forbids the reaching beyond them, and visiting responsibility in civil damages upon the corporation itself. Its liability will be measured by the same rules of law which determine the liability of the employé. Applying this test, we suppose the rule to be well settled that persons of intelligence are presumed to have intended the natural consequence of their deliberate acts. If, therefore, the natural result of placing slack and refuse in the stream, or on the margin or bank, is that they will be washed down by heavy rains onto the lands of plaintiff, and this would be apparent to the ordinary observer, it is but just to assume, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the expectation was that it should so wash; and this state of facts would show that the Company exercised its right negligently. But if such washing was not a natural consequence, and would not have been anticipated as a natural result by persons of usual intelligence in the exercise of ordinary care, no intent would be presumed, nor negligence imputed; and, if damage ensued to persons having property on the streams below, by the washing of slack, etc., no liability would attach to those who made the deposits. And, in substance, the foregoing was given by the trial judge to the jury. The charge upon other questions presented is an accurate statement of the law of the case. An examination of the record fails to show any error therein.

Judgment affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Oliver BROWN, Appt.,
v.
W. A. CUNNINGHAM.

(...Iowa...)

1. A ruling on a demurrer does not bind the court to follow it in deciding whether or not the facts proved as alleged in the petition demurred to entitle the plaintiff to recover.
2. The breach of an injunction bond requires the question of a right to recover at least nominal damages thereon to be submitted to the jury.
3. Ice on a non-navigable stream which was meandered in the government survey and the ice of which has never been transferred by the United States may be cut and property thereon acquired by any person who can get access to it without trespassing upon the lands of riparian owners.
4. The same rights exist in ice upon a stream that exist in the waters of a stream.

(May 31, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Jones County in favor of defendant in an action upon an injunction bond. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Meers, Shearn & McCarn, C. M. Brown and E. Keeler, for appellant:

The overruling of the demurrer should have settled the law of the case in favor of plaintiff.

Allen v. Platt, 79 Iowa, 118; Frentress v. Mobley, 10 Iowa, 450.

The plaintiff in the injunction suit had no right to the ice in the river. The title to the bed of the stream remained in the government. Serrin v. Grigs, 87 Iowa, 196; Wood v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 456.

Ice already formed is to be regarded as personal property whether in or out of water when sold.

Higgins v. Kusterer, 41 Mich. 318, 83 Am. Rep. 160, and note, 164.

The right of cutting and taking ice, either for use or for sale, in the public waters of the Commonwealth, is a public right, which may be exercised by any citizen who can obtain access to the pond without trespassing upon the lands of other persons, and who does not by the exercise of this right unreasonably interfere with its similar exercise by others.

Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160.

Plaintiff and Atkinson had the right in common with others to go upon the river and cut and remove ice therefrom, and were entitled to protection in the lawful exercise of this right, which was similar to that of the public to take fish from navigable waters, to take sea-weed cut upon the shore between high and low water mark, and others of a like character.

See Mather v. Chapman, 40 Conn. 382, 18 Am. Rep. 46; People's Ice Company v. Steamer Excelsior, 44 Mich. 239, 38 Am. Rep. 246, 255, note, citing Bowell v. Doyle, 131 Mass. 474; Gage v. Steinkrauss, Id. 232. See also Lincoln v. Davis, 53 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116; Packard v. Ryder, 4 New Eng. Rep. 245, 144 Mass. 440, 59 Am. Rep. 101; Woodman v. Pitman, 4 New Eng. Rep. 699, 79 Me. 456, 1 Am. St. Rep. 342; 2 Bl. Com. 14; 2 Kent, Com. 348.

In those States where navigable rivers are held to be public property, the riparian pro-

NOTE.—Common right to use of ice on river.

The right of traveling upon the ice of a river, and the right of cutting and taking the ice, are natural and common rights. Woodman v. Pitman 4 New Eng. Rep. 699, 79 Me. 456; State v. Wilson, 43 Me. 25; Brastow v. Rockport Ice Co. 77 Me. 100.

The privilege of gathering ice upon waters which are public property is a common right, as from the great ponds in Massachusetts. Gould, Waters, § 191, citing Hittinger v. Eames, 121 Mass. 539; Poore, Charters and Constitutions, pt. 1, p. 321; Cummings v. Barrett, 10 Cuah. 136; West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158; Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160; Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441; Fay v. Salem & D. Aqueduct Co. 111 Mass. 27; Gage v. Steinkrauss, 131 Mass. 232; Tudor v. Cambridge Water Works, 1 Allen, 164.

So the owners of lands bordering on navigable streams in those States where they are held to be public property have no title to the ice which forms in such streams; the ice belongs to the first appropriator. Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 683; Hickey v. Hazard, 3 Mo. App. 430.

An appropriation of ice on these streams is made by surveying, marking and staking off the ice unappropriated by others. See Wood v. Fowler and Hickey v. Hazard, supra.

Right to take ice.

The right to take ice results from and grows out of the title to the bed of the stream, and such right to the use of the water as results therefrom. This 12 L. R. A.

right is well settled by authority, as well as by principle. Gould, Waters, § 191; Ham v. Salem, 100 Mass. 350; Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 172.

The owner of land flowed by a millpond may cut ice therefrom for market, provided it does not appreciably diminish the head of water at the lower dam. Searle v. Gardner (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 430; Cummings v. Barrett, 10 Cuah. 136.

When the State appropriates the fee of the land for construction of canals the former owner has no right to take the ice therefrom. Indianapolis Water Works Co. v. Burkhardt, 41 Ind. 364; Cromie v. Wabash & E. Canal Trustees, 71 Ind. 208; Carr v. McCaleb, 69 Ill. 314, cited in Gould, Waters, § 191.

A lessee with the exclusive right to cut and carry away ice from a pond may sue a stranger for cutting the ice. Richards v. Gaufrét, 5 New Eng. Rep. 396, 145 Mass. 436.

He can also sue lessor if he interferes with his rights. Idid.

Riparian owner; right to ice.

Uncut ice is an accession or increment to the land. Washington Ice Co. v. Shortall, 101 Ill. 54. See also Bigelow v. Shaw, 8 West. Rep. 733, 65 Mich. 341; Mill River Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 34 Conn. 463; State v. Pottmeyer, 38 Ind. 402; Lorman v. Benson, 3 Mich. 18; Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 519.

Riparian ownership of the bed of the stream will carry with it the right to the ice forming upon the surface of such stream, as far as the riparian right to the soil extends. Bigelow v. Shaw, supra.

The riparian owner on an unnavigable stream 12

prietor has no title to the ice forming in such streams as an incident to his ownership of the bank, but the ice belongs to the first appropriator, such appropriation being effected by marking, surveying and staking off the ice, and these acts give sufficient possession to support trespass.

Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682, 40 Am. Rep. 330; Hickey v. Hazard, 8 Mo. App. 430.

Mr. J. W. Jamison, for appellee:

The case of Allen v. Pratt, 79 Iowa, 118, relied upon by appellant in support of his position, is grounded wholly upon a question of pleading under the Code.

See § 2650.

The rule of pleading is too well settled to admit of controversy. That a party waives any objection he might have to the overruling of his demurrer to the pleading of the adverse party by pleading over has been repeatedly held by this court in numerous cases, and the case of Allen v. Pratt, supra, is to the same effect. No new principle is announced in the case, nor does the opinion enlarge the office of a demurrer. No case can be found where this court has held that the party whose pleading has been assailed by a demurrer, and a favorable ruling had in favor of the pleading, can thereby insist that such ruling is an adjudication of the law of the case estopping both the court and the party upon an issue joined by pleading over.

See Games v. Robb, 8 Iowa, 193; Lyon v. O'Kell, 14 Iowa, 238; Smith v. Henry County, 15 Iowa, 365; Frasman v. Hart, 61 Iowa, 525.

One acquires no right of property in ice formed in the public waters simply by going upon the river and staking it out or preparing it for removal by cutting.

Serrin v. Grafe, 67 Iowa, 197; Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 324.

All rights to the land between high and low water mark, except that of absolute title subject to the public right of navigation, belong to the riparian owner.

St. Paul & Pac. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 287, 19 L. ed. 78; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 934.

Plaintiff could acquire no right of property to the ice by merely going upon the river and staking it out or cutting it. The only right he could maintain as against another was the right to the ice actually appropriated.

Turley v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583; Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 475; Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 845; Lewis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 130; Welch v. Jenks, 58 Iowa, 696.

Beck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff and another were engaged in cutting and putting up ice obtained in the Wapepicon River,—not a navigable stream, but meandered in the government surveys of the public lands, and therefore its bed was never disposed of by the government by sales of the adjacent lands. It does not appear that the government ever transferred in any manner the bed of the river. The plaintiff and his business associate, not being the riparian owners, entered upon the river, and cut and put in an icehouse a large quantity of ice, and cut and made preparations for moving other ice to their icehouse. It is not claimed or shown that they were trespassers upon the lands of the riparian owners, or that they did not rightfully and lawfully obtain access to the river. The defendant in this suit brought an action to enjoin plaintiff and his associate from gathering the ice, on the ground that he was the owner of the ice. This claim of ownership, we gather from the abstract and arguments, was based upon the fact that he was the ripa-the owner of the ice formed upon the water, though the icefield is made by fowage caused by a milldam of a riparian owner below; and the latter, maliciously and unnecessarily drawing the water from the pond, and thus destroying the ice privilege, is liable in damages to the former. Stevens v. Kelley, 3 New Eng. Rep. 230, 73 Me. 445.

The owner of land bordering upon a flowing stream may detain a reasonable portion until it freezes, and cut and sell the ice. But he cannot interfere with the beneficial enjoyment of the water by owners below him. Myer v. Whitaker, 5 Abb. N. C. 176; Stevens v. Kelley, supra.

The grantee of lands under navigable water in front of his uplands cannot restrain the grantee of similar adjoining lands under water from erecting thereon dykes which will prevent him from towing ice cakes across them to his own premises; nor can he question the legality of such structure. Knick-erbocker Ice Co. v. Shultz, 116 N. Y. 382.

Title to ice formed on private waters.

The title to ice is the same as the title to the water before it is congealed. Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191.

Ice forming on a navigable fresh-water stream, the bed of which belongs to the riparian proprietors, is their property. Washington Ice Co. v. Shortall, 101 Ill. 46.

Ice forming on private fresh-water streams and ponds belongs exclusively to the riparian proprietors, who may prevent its removal by others without license. Mill River Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 19 L. R. A.

34 Conn. 462; Edgerton v. Huff, 26 Ind. 35; State v. Pottmeyer, 30 Ind. 387, 68 Ind. 402; Bates v. State, 31 Ind. 72; Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18.

The owner of an artificial mill-pond is entitled, as against the riparian owners, to have the ice which forms thereon remain if its removal will appreciably diminish the head of water at his dam. Seeley v. Brush, 35 Conn. 419; Myer v. Whitaker, 55 How. Pr. 376; Marshall v. Peters, 19 How. Pr. 213.

A grant of the right to flow land by damming a stream gives to the grantee the exclusive right to gather the ice which forms on the pond so made. Myer v. Whitaker, 5 Abb. N. C. 173, criticised in Dodge v. Berry, 26 Hun, 245, 25 Alb. L. J. 303.

A license to take ice from a pond does not pass title to the ice until it is executed, and then only to the extent to which it is executed or enjoyed. Balcom v. McQuestion, 65 N. H. 81.

Damages for trespass on rights.

Damages are recoverable for the wanton destruction of ice while in process of formation. People's Ice Co. v. Steamer Excelsior, 44 Mich. 229.

The measure of damages for a wrongful taking of ice from another's waters is the value of the ice when converted and ready for removal and sale. Washington Ice Co. v. Shortall, 101 Ill. 46, 25 Alb. L. J. 106.

Parol sale of ice.

Ice upon a pond or stream is of such an ephemeral nature that like personal property it may be sold by parol. Higgins v. Kusterer, 41 Mich. 322.

riar owner, and his rights as such extended to and covered the ice in the stream. The cause was tried on the merits, and a decree entered dismissing the petition and dissolving the injunction. Plaintiff herein has acquired all rights in the subject of litigation held by his associate. The defendant herein demurred to plaintiff's petition on the ground that the facts stated do not entitle plaintiff to relief; that the petition fails to show that the plaintiff had any special right to cut the ice other than what is possessed by the public generally, or that he owned the land adjacent to the river at the locality where the ice was cut, and that he acquired no right to the ice by cutting the same. The demurrer was overruled, defendant excepting; but he afterwards pleaded over by answer denying the allegations of the petition. The cause was submitted upon the evidence of plaintiff establishing the facts as we have stated them. Thereupon the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for defendant, holding that upon the undisputed facts plaintiff could not recover.

2. Counsel for plaintiff think that, as defendant did not stand upon his demurrer, the decision thereon was conclusive in this case, and that the district court erred in not holding that the facts proved, which conformed to the allegations of the petition, entitled plaintiff to recover; that a contrary holding conflicts with the decision on the demurrer, which should be regarded as the law of the case. We think that a court is not bound by a prior decision in a case where no rights have been acquired under it, and may change, modify or overrule it if convinced of its error. Decisions are not to be regarded as unalterable without regard to their correctness. However desirable it may be to have consistency in the decisions of a court in the same case, it is better that the court correct its errors, if in its judgment any have occurred. In this case we shall presume the court below declined to follow the ruling on the demurrer. That ruling will not be regarded as conclusive. Jenkins v. Shields, 86 Iowa, 526; Standish v. Dow, 21 Iowa, 368; Norton v. Knapp, 64 Iowa, 112. This rule is applicable when different judges make successive rulings in a case. The last judge making a ruling ought not to be bound by a prior ruling of another judge when he would not be bound by the prior ruling had he made it himself. It is here that courtesy would appear to require the second judge to conform his views to those of the first. But justice may demand quite the contrary, and its demands must overcome the requirements of courtesy.

3. If the facts alleged in the petition do not entitle plaintiff to recover, the defendant may demur (Code, § 2648, par. 5), or move in arrest of judgment (Code, § 2650; Smith v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 75; Edgerly v. Farmers Ins. Co. 43 Iowa, 587); and when the allegations of the petition are supported by proof, but do not constitute a cause of action, it is competent for the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff cannot recover. Seaton v. Hinnehan, 50 Iowa, 895.

We are advised of no rule prevailing in this State which will authorize a judgment on petition and proof which shows no legal liability on the ground that a demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendant answered over, denying the allegations of the petition. This is the point presented in the case.

4. We are to determine whether, upon the facts we have recited, defendant is liable upon the injunction bond. It very clearly appears that, as there was a breach of the bond which is not disputed, plaintiff is entitled to at least nominal damages, though he suffered no special injury from being deprived of the ice, for the reason that he had no right to it. The question of plaintiff's right to recover at least nominal damages should have been submitted to the jury.

5. But in our opinion, upon the facts of the case above recited, plaintiff did have a right to and property in the ice he had prepared to remove, and a property right to obtain ice out of the stream pursuant to the plan upon which he was working. The river, while not navigable, was meandered in the government survey. The bed of the stream—the land—never passed out of the proprietorship of the United States government, and the riparian owners had no right or interest therein, and therefore had no exclusive rights to the ice found upon the stream. In support of this position, see Serrin v. Grefe, 67 Iowa, 197.

6. The United States retains the title to the bed of the stream, which it holds, not for disposition nor for use in any way that will interfere with the rights of the riparian owners and the public to the water of the stream and its uses for all proper purposes. It cannot be claimed that the government can prevent riparian owners from using the water to evolve power for mechanical purposes, for domestic use, for supplying towns and cities, and for all the purposes for which water may be lawfully used. Of course, such use must be so limited and restricted that the rights of riparian owners and of all others holding rights to the water shall not be interfered with. It cannot be thought the government has the power or authority to divert the stream, dry up the water, or so contaminate it that it could not be used for proper purposes. The government has no more property in the water than a riparian owner or the public. The beneficent Creator opened the fountains which filled the stream for the benefit of His creatures, and has bestowed no power upon man or governments created by man to defeat His beneficence. Of course, the use of the water may be regulated by the State, but the State may not forbid its use to the people. As streams of water begin ex jure natura, they are subject, as to course and use, only to Nature's laws. The maxim of the common law intended to protect all people in the enjoyment of Nature's watercourses, namely, "aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat," is as obligatory upon the government as upon the citizen. Under this maxim there can be no restriction upon the use and enjoyment of water when flowing in Nature's stream. Whoever has lawful access to the stream flowing over a bed owned by the government, and held in trust for the benefit of the people, may use the water as regulated by law. In the case before us it is not shown nor claimed that plaintiff did not have lawful right to go upon the stream. It is plain that the same rights to the ice exist which may be held to the water, for the ice is water in another form,—is congealed water. Its uses for comfort, luxury and health are known and demanded everywhere. It cannot be doubted that, in accord with the views we have expressed, any citizen who may lawfully go upon the stream may gather ice from it under the regulations prescribed by law. He is entitled to the ice he prepares by his labor to be removed. It is plain that if he cuts ice for transportation to his ice-house, another cannot rob him of his labors by carrying away his ice; and it is plain that when he makes preparations to use the ice upon a certain part of the stream, prepares its surface for cutting, erects machinery to handle the ice, makes walks or ways for workmen, or in any other proper manner indicates the part of the stream which he occupies in his operations, which must be reasonable in extent and in all other respects, he has a property right to the occupation of such locality during the ice season, and to the ice formed there. When men are thrown together without government or established rules to regulate their possessions and use of the land they occupy, they tacitly assent to just such rules as follow from the doctrines we have announced. This has been done by settlers and miners in every Territory of the Union, as well as in every land where the ideas of civilized justice, and especially the Anglo-Saxon ideas of the protection of individual property, prevail. Shall not the courts, where there is established government, recognize, protect and enforce rights which are instinctively recognized by our people? Indeed, courts are established to enforce and protect all rights held by men not surrendered to the State, thereby promoting order and peace of the State. In support of these views we cite the following authorities: Woodman v.

Pitman, 79 Me. 456, 4 New Eng. Rep. 699; People's Ice Co. v. Steamer Excelsior, 44 Mich. 226, 38 Am. Rep. 246, and notes; West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158; Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160; Angell, Watercourses, §§ 74, 93, 185, 536, and notes to each section; Hickey v. Hazard, 3 Mo. App. 480; Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682; Brastors v. Rockport Ice Co. 77 Me. 100; Gage v. Steinkrause, 181 Mass. 222; Roswell v. Doyle, Id. 474; Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435, and notes; Brooklyn v. Pitman, supra, citing some other cases.

7. This case is distinguishable from Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co., 55 Iowa, 478, and Turley v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583, and other cases cited upon the same point by counsel, by its facts. In these cases it was held that trespassers upon land,—government or private,—who cut grass or timber for removal, acquired no property therein. The grass and timber are a part of the realty, and are permanent, and not subject, as water, to movement and change. The owner of the land owns the grass and trees. But the owner of the land over which a stream flows does not own the water so as to appropriate it to his own exclusive use and stop its flow. He may lawfully enjoy it while it is flowing over his land. When it enters the land of another he loses all interest in it. The cases cited above are not applicable to the facts of the case before us. These considerations lead us to the conclusion that the court below erred in withdrawing the case from the jury, and directing a verdict for defendant.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Richard D. FISHER et al., Appts.,

v.

Hiram G. DUDLEY et al., Supervisors of Election.

(....Md....)

A candidate nominated independently by the requisite number of voters under Code Gen. Laws, § 131, who has also been nominated by a party convention, is entitled by implication to another place on the official ballot in addition to that in the group of candidates of the political party which has nominated him in convention.

(June 16, 1891.)

APPEAL by petitioners from an order of the Baltimore City Court denying their application for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to place the name of a candidate for office nominated by them upon the official ticket in a different place than that assigned to him as a nominee of the Republican party. Reversed.

NOTE.—For decisions as to the proper form of ballots under the recent Election Laws, see note to Talcott v. Philbrick (Conn.) 10 L. R. A. 150 12 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., and Irving, Robinson, Bryan, Briscoe, Miller, McSherry and Fowler, JJ.

Messrs. Joseph Packard, Jr., Charles J. Bonaparte and John C. Rose for appellants.

Messrs. William S. Bryan, Jr., and Peter J. Campbell for appellees.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By section 128 of article 38 of the Code of Public General Laws, as enacted by chapter 588, page 615, of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1890, all ballots to be used and cast at any election in the State are to be printed and furnished at public expense; and upon those ballots are to be printed the names of the several candidates, according to directions given in succeeding sections enacted by the same Act; and the refusal of the board of supervisors of Baltimore City to place the name of Edward Stabler, Jr., as a candidate for the first branch of the City Council of Baltimore City as an independent candidate in a separate place and column other than the column containing the names of candidates of the Republican party has given rise to this proceeding. The appellants filed their petition in the Baltimore City Court, representing that Edward Stabler, Jr., had been nominated by more than 200 citizens, including the petitioners, all of whom are registered voters, as an independent candidate for the first branch of the city council of Baltimore City; that they are not Republicans, and that they have not nominated Mr. Stabler because he is a Republican, but wholly irrespective of the question of political association; and that they have requested that the name of Mr. Stabler should be put upon the ballot in a different place from the column containing the nominations of the Republican party, which party had also nominated Mr. Stabler as a candidate for the same place, as the petitioners and others had done, by a paper containing more than 200 names; but that the Supervisors of Election had refused to comply with their request, and would not put Mr. Stabler's name anywhere but in the Republican group and under the Republican emblem; wherefore the appellants ask for a mandamus upon the Supervisors of Election, compelling them to print the name of Mr. Stabler on the official ballots in the independent group of candidates for the place already mentioned. The appellees answered, denying the right of petitioners to have Mr. Stabler's name printed elsewhere on the ballot than in the Republican group. The court agreed with the appellees, and overruled the petitioners' demurrer to the defendants' answer, and refused the mandamus; hence this appeal, which raises the following questions under the new Election Law: (1) If two or more political parties, or bodies of citizens, calling themselves by a party name, nominate, either by conventions, primary elections or nomination papers, the same man as a candidate for the same office, has each of the parties who nominated him the right to have his name printed on the official ballots under the name of such party and its emblem, if it has selected one? (2) If the same man is nominated by a political party, and by a nomination paper, in which no party name is set forth, have the persons signing the nomination papers the right to have the name of their candidate printed on the official ballot in another place than under the party name and emblem of the political party by which such candidate was then nominated? The questions thus raised depend upon the proper construction of section 181 of article 33, as enacted, by the Act of 1890, chapter 583, page 615, already mentioned, in conjunction with sections 129 and 180. Section 129 provides that any convention, as hereinafter defined, held for the purpose of making nominations to public office, and also registered voters to the number hereinafter specified, may nominate candidates for public offices to be filled by election within the State or any parts thereof. A "convention" is then defined, and it is also declared in that section that nominations may then be made by means of primary elections without the intervention of any convention. A convention under this section must represent an organized body which polled at the late general election at least 1 per cent of the entire vote cast in the State, county, ward, or other division for which the nomination is made.

Section 180 provides how a nomination by a convention or by a primary election shall be certified and for the addition of a party emblem, and what that may be. Section 181 says: "A candidate for public office may be nominated otherwise than by a convention or primary election in the manner following: A nomination paper containing the name of the candidate nominated, his residence, and the office for which he is nominated, shall be signed by registered voters" residing within the political division for which he is nominated; and, stating the number of signatures necessary for various offices, it names not less than 200 names as necessary where the candidate seeks the office which Mr. Stabler does. This nomination paper must be verified by affidavit before a justice of the peace that the signers are registered voters of the district or precinct in which they respectively state they reside. In this case the petitioners' paper nomination was so verified, and was so stated to be in their petition. The appellees contend that the application of the appellants was unreasonable, and asked that which the law did not provide for, and which, in their judgment, might lead to great inconvenience, and result in a candidate's name being indefinitely repeated in sundry columns, which they contend might greatly enlarge the size of the ballots to be used for voting. They insist that the law does not in express terms entitle a party nominated independently, who may also have been nominated by a political party, to appear but once on the ballot, and that place they decided in this case should be under the party name and emblem. They also say that there is no reasonable implication of such right. A majority of this court, however, is of opinion that a reasonable construction of the law does, by implication, entitle such candidate, when nominated independently by the requisite number of voters, to a place on the ticket in a place other than in the group of candidates of the political party which may also have nominated him. The law does not design to make a party nomination and emblem superior in weight or respectability to the nomination of a number of citizens who disregarded party, and not desiring to be considered partisans, have selected a man as their candidate for office wholly for his worth, and entirely irrespective of his party affiliation. Desiring to rise above party, and to disown relation and allegiance to it, they ought not to be compelled to vote for a man as a Republican, Democrat, or of any other party name, and to use the ticket of such party and its emblem to accomplish their desire. And a man who has accepted the nomination of a Republican party or Democratic party or any other party ought not to be denied the privilege and benefit of accepting the nomination of registered voters who do not desire to vote a partisan ticket. We think, therefore, that when the Legislature gave to registered voters in certain numbers the right to nominate a candidate by paper signatures and affidavit, as hereinbefore mentioned, it was intended to give them the same right to an independent place, separate from a party place, as was given to the several political parties. If it should so happen that two political parties should nominate and indorse the same person for a particular place (which has sometimes happened), can it be doubted that each party so nominating should be and would be entitled to have such persons' names printed in the place assigned to each party? Can it be possible that the Legislature intended to give the supervisors the right of restricting the appearance of such persons' names to a place on the ballot, and selecting under which party name it should so appear? Certainly not; and, if not, surely there is no greater reason for their insisting that a person nominated as Mr. Stabler was shall be voted for only as a partisan, and not also as an independent candidate of the persons nominating him by paper, who are not partisans, and not Republicans as they say in their petition, and do not desire to vote as if they were. We do not see that this construction of the law will be likely to lead to any such inconvenience as is suggested by the appellees; for, no matter by how many independent papers of the requisite number of registered voters persons may be nominated, still, having no party name or emblem, they are all to be classed as independents, and the insertion of the candidates' names in an independent column would seem to meet all the requirements of the law, and all the reasonable demands of the candidates so nominated; and a separate column for each independent candidate so nominated would not seem to be necessary. The object of the Legislature would seem to be to give any person nominated in the way suggested, and as done here, a place other than in a group of party nominations, with which the voters making the nomination did not desire to co-operate.

The election being long passed before this appeal reached this court, a reversal of the order and the granting of mandamus will be nugatory, because the order cannot be executed; but as the question is one of public concern, and the opinion of this court is desired for the future guidance of the Supervisors, we have expressed our views, and in accordance with them the order must be reversed.

DIXON, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

We are satisfied with the decision of the learned advisory master respecting all the instruments in dispute, except the chattel mortgage made September 15, 1889, by the Universal Rubber Company, for $7,000. This he held to be inoperative against the receiver of the Company, representing its creditors, because it was not, in his opinion, lawfully recorded. The supposed illegality of the record arose from the fact that it had not been proved, but merely acknowledged, the master thinking that our Statutes require all corporate deeds to be proved by a subscribing witness in order to be recorded. The pertinent statutes are a supplement to the Act concerning mortgages (Pub. Laws 1881, p. 226), which provides that no chattel mortgage shall be recorded, unless the execution thereof shall be first acknowledged or proved, and such acknowledgment or proof certified thereon, in the manner prescribed by the Act respecting conveyances; and the Act respecting conveyances (Rev. p. 152), which provides that any deed may be recorded, if it "shall be acknowledged by the party or parties who shall have executed it, the officer having first made known the contents thereof to the person making such acknowledgment, and being also satisfied that such person is the grantor mentioned in said

The seal of a corporation aggregate affixed to a deed is of itself prima facie evidence that it was affixed by the authority of the corporation, especially if proved to have been put to the deed by an officer who was intrusted by the corporation with the custody of such seal. *Union Bridge Co. v. When the common seal is affixed, and the signatures of the proper officers are proved, courts will presume that the officers did not exceed their authority, and the seal itself is prima facie evidence that it was affixed by proper authority. *Canandagua Academy v. deed, . . . or if it be proved, by one or more of the subscribing witnesses to it, that such party or parties signed, sealed and delivered the same as his, her or their voluntary act and deed." We have not, as in some States, e. g., Maryland and Missouri, a statute relating to the acknowledgment or proof of corporate deeds particularly; but no doubt exists that, under the Act respecting conveyances, the deeds of corporations aggregate can be lawfully recorded, and therefore can be lawfully either acknowledged or proved. The opinion adopted by the master is that they may be proved, but cannot be acknowledged. This opinion rests, I suppose, on the notion that the corporation, the party executing the deed, cannot, in propria persona, appear before the officer, be informed by him of its contents, and thereupon acknowledge its execution. But a similar difficulty exists with regard to proving the execution. A subscribing witness cannot swear that the party, the corporation, in propria persona, signed, sealed and delivered the deed, for each of these three acts must be done by a representative of the corporate body. If, then, the Statute implies that the representative of a corporation is the party executing a corporate deed for the purpose of proof by a subscribing witness, why may it not also imply that such a representative is the party for the purpose of acknowledgment? The Statute must receive such a construction as will attain its manifest object, which is that all conveyances, whether by natural or artificial persons, may be recorded. Hence we find that in Den v. Tunis, 25 N. J. L. 683, this court, speaking by Chief Justice Green, said: "A corporate deed can be proved only by proving that the seal affixed is the seal of the corporation, or that it was affixed as the corporate seal by an officer of the corporation, or other person thereunto duly authorized." Such proof deviates widely from the language of the Statute, which calls for proof of acts that are visible, that are done by the party himself, and that per se constitute the execution of the deed; while the opinion is complied with by proof of matters which are largely the inferences of the witness, which are the acts merely of an agent of the party, and which constitute per se only evidence of the execution of the deed. Applying similar liberality of construction to the clause of the Statute authorizing acknowledgments, it will embrace corporate deeds. The act says the officer taking the acknowledgment must be satisfied that the person executing and acknowledging the deed is the grantor mentioned in it. With regard to corporate deeds, he must therefore be satisfied that such person is, in the eye of the law, the grantor mentioned in it; that is, authorized to represent the corporation in executing and acknowledging the conveyance. Being so satisfied, he accepts the acknowledgment of the representative as that of the grantor itself. This accords with the view expressed in other States upon like enactments. Thus in Merrill v. Montgomery, 25 Mich. 73, the court said, as to corporate deeds: "The acknowledgment is to be made by the person representing the corporation in that act." And in Lootti v. Steam Sawmill Assn., 6 Paige, 54, 3 L. ed. 696, Chancellor Walworth, speaking of the New York Registry Act, which required deeds to be acknowledged by the party executing the same, said: "The officer or agent of a corporation, who executed a deed in the name of the corporation, by affixing thereto the impression of the common or corporate seal intrusted to his care, is the party executing the deed, as it is impossible that a corporation aggregate should execute or acknowledge a deed in person."

Our conclusion is that, on the appeal of the receiver, those parts of the decree of which they complain should be affirmed, and on the appeal of Susan C. Lovejoy, that part of the decree which holds her chattel mortgage above mentioned invalid against the receiver should be reversed, and that part which relates to the amount due upon her mortgages of October 27, 1887, should be affirmed.

Unanimous on both points.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Ex Parte Mary Inez McCABE.

(46 Fed. Rep. 363.)

1. A warrant to compel a person demanded as a criminal by a foreign government to appear and submit to a preliminary examination when issued by a county judge under Rev. Stat., § 5370, although he styles himself also an extradition agent, is not invalid because it does not recite the source of his authority to issue it.
2. A complaint made under oath is necessary to authorize a warrant to compel a preliminary examination of a person demanded by a foreign government as a criminal.
3. Courts must take judicial notice of a treaty with a foreign government.
4. The law of nations does not require the surrender of a fugitive, whether citizen or alien, to a foreign government in the absence of a treaty stipulation requiring it.

5. A citizen of the United States cannot be surrendered to Mexico as a fugitive under the Treaty with that country which provides that "neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens;" the surrender is not to be made according to the will or discretion of the executive, but only when required by the Treaty.

(April 2, 1891.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of Nueces County, Texas, by whom she was detained in accordance with certain proceedings instituted for the purpose of having her returned to Mexico as an alleged fugitive from justice. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion. Messrs. George R. Scott and F. R. Graves for petitioner.

Maxey, J., delivered the following opinion:

On the 26th of February, 1891, a petition, duly verified by affidavit, was presented to the court on behalf of Mrs. Mary Inez McCabe, stating that she had been arrested by the sheriff of Nueces County, Tex., and was now illegally detained and restrained of her liberty. It is alleged in the petition that the petitioner was born in Bandera County, Tex., of parents of American birth; that her husband, H. T. McCabe, was born in the State of Illinois, of parents of American birth, and that both she and her husband have continued to be and are now citizens of the United States. The further allegations are made:

"That since the 18th day of February, A. D. 1891, she has been unlawfully and illegally restrained of her liberty by one Patrick Whelan, sheriff of Nueces County, and who pretends to be acting under and by the authority of a certain Treaty and convention between the United States of America and the republic of Mexico, of date the 11th of December, 1861, and by virtue of certain telegraphic and other pretended writs and papers from a pretended officer, who styles himself the county judge of Cameron County, and extradition agent, County of Cameron, and the copies of the which said papers and process are hereto attached."

After reciting other facts, not necessary to consider, the petition prays for the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus. Among the papers attached as exhibits to the petition, the only one deserving of notice is the writ issued by Judge Forto in the following form:

"THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

"The State of Texas to the Sheriff or any Constable of Nueces County, Texas, greeting: Whereas, pursuant to the existing treaty between the United States of America and the republic of Mexico for the extradition of criminal fugitives from justice under certain circumstances, the Hon. Lamón F. Flores, judge in and for the Third Judicial District of the state of Tamaulipas, and extradition agent in and for said district in said state of Tamaulipas, republic of Mexico, has made requisition and application in due form to me, E. C. Forto, county judge of Cameron County, Texas, and extradition agent, for the arrest of Maria Inez McCabe, who stands charged with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in the Town of Reynosa, within the Third Judicial District, as aforesaid, on the 18th day of August, 1890, by feloniously killing one Max Stein, at such time and place, and that the said Maria Inez McCabe has fled from the custody of the proper officers in the City of Matamoros, in said state of Tamaulipas, and has taken refuge in this State of Texas, from the laws and justice of the state of Tamaulipas as aforesaid. And whereas, it appears proper that the said Maria Inez McCabe should be apprehended, as requested in said requisition and application made by the said judge of the Third Judicial District of the said state of Tamaulipas, and extradition agent as aforesaid, on the 14th day of February, 1891, and that the said charge preferred against her, the said Maria Inez McCabe, be examined in the manner provided for by law: Now, I, E. C. Forto, county judge of Cameron County, Texas, and extradition agent, do hereby command you to arrest the said Maria Inez McCabe, if to be found in your county, and bring her before me as such county judge of said Cameron County, Texas, and extradition agent, at my office in the City of Brownsville, in the said County of Cameron, and State of Texas, forthwith, then and there to answer the said requisition and application for arrest and extradition, as aforesaid, and that the necessary proceedings may be had in pursuance to law, in order that the criminality of the said Maria Inez McCabe may be heard and considered, and, if deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, that she may be surrendered under the law. Herein fail not, but of this writ make due return, showing how you have executed the same.

"Witness my official signature, and the seal of the County Court of the County of Cameron, at my office in the City of Brownsville, Texas, on this 16th day of February, A. D. 1891.

(Signed)

"E. C. Forto.

"County Judge and Extradition Agent, Cameron County, Texas."

On the day the petition was presented, a writ of habeas corpus was directed to be issued to Sheriff Whelan, and a certiorari to Judge Forto, and the order of court further directed the clerk to transmit a copy of the order, by registered mail, to the consul of the republic of Mexico, resident at Brownsville. The writs to the county judge and sheriff, respectively, were made returnable the 17th of March, 1891, on which day the sheriff produced the prisoner before the court, and made return to the habeas corpus, the material portion of which is in the following words:

"In obedience to the within writ, I hereby produce before the Hon. District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas Mary Inez McCabe, and attach hereto the writ of E. C. Forto, county judge of Cameron and extradition agent, upon which authority I had and held the said Mary Inez McCabe at the time of service upon me of the within writ of habeas corpus."

The writ of certiorari was not served upon the county judge in Cameron County, but in Austin, and only a few days before the day set for the hearing. His sworn answer shows that it was impracticable for him to procure copies of the proceedings had before him in time for the 17th; and, to avoid further delay, the following statement made by Judge Forto, and on file among the papers of the cause, was accepted as a sufficient return to the writ:

"That the warrant for the arrest of Mrs. M. I. McCabe was based on a requisition made by the district judge and extradition agent at Matamoros, Mexico. That said requisition charges the said M. I. McCabe with having committed the crime of murder, as recited in said warrant. That said requisition is not certified to by the American consul residing at Matamoras, Mexico, and that it came to me through the Mexican consul at Brownsville.

"As directed by the order of court, the clerk transmitted by registered mail a copy of the order before mentioned to the Mexican consul at Brownsville, and his reply, acknowledging receipt, is now on file."

It will thus be seen that the warrant for the arrest of the prisoner was predicated upon the requisition made by Hon. Lamon F. Flores, federal judge of the Third District of the state of Tamaulipas and acting as extradition agent for said district. And the sheriff of Nueces County was commanded by the warrant to arrest Mrs. McCabe, and take her before the county judge of Cameron County, "then and there to answer the said requisition and application for arrest and extradition." Judge Forto had before him no "complaint made under oath" charging the prisoner with crime, nor was there in fact presented to him any complaint, document or other paper as a predicate for the warrant, except the requisition of Judge Flores. The only step taken by the county judge was the issuance of the warrant of arrest. Thenceforth he performed no official act in relation to the proceeding. At the hearing on the 17th inst., which was ex parte, no one appearing for the Mexican government, the only evidence introduced by the prisoner was on the question of citizenship, and from the proof it clearly appears that both she and her husband are now, and have been continuously since their births, citizens of the United States. The court desires here to state that the expression of its views will be limited solely to the objections urged by counsel for petitioner. Other questions, as those affecting the regularity and validity of the requisition emanating from Judge Flores, and the competency of the sheriff of a county to execute a warrant of arrest issued pursuant to the extradition statutes, and perhaps some others, which are suggested by the proceedings in this case, will be passed over, and their consideration reserved. Upon the foregoing record the question arises, Shall the prisoner be discharged, or remanded to custody to be dealt with by the proper authorities, as the laws of extradition and the Treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico direct? Her counsel insist upon an immediate discharge, and assign in support of their contention three specified grounds: (1) the warrant which issued for the arrest of the petitioner is void, because it fails to disclose upon its face that the officer issuing it was duly authorized for that purpose by the chief executive of Texas; (2) the warrant is without validity for the further reason that it was not based upon a complaint made under oath; (3) the petitioner, being a citizen of the United States, cannot lawfully be surrendered to the authorities of Mexico for punishment for crime committed withip the jurisdiction of the latter republic.

The first point requiring the consideration of the court is whether the questions suggested by the objections of counsel are raised in such manner as to be reviewable on a writ of habeas corpus. It is settled law that a writ of habeas corpus in a case of extradition cannot perform the office of a writ of error. Employing the language of the supreme court: "The main question to be considered upon such a writ of habeas corpus must be, 'Had the commissioner jurisdiction to hear and decide upon the complaint made by the Mexican consul?'—and, also, Was there sufficient legal ground for his action in committing the prisoner to await the requisition of the Mexican authorities?" Benson v. McMahon, 127 U. S. 462, 33 L. ed. 286.

It is not deemed necessary to enter upon a discussion of the proposition, and the court will content itself, after a careful examination of the authorities, with the statement of the conclusion that the questions in this case are properly presented, and require a distinct ruling. Re Luis Oleisay v. Cortes, 136 U. S. 330, 34 L. ed. 464; Benson v. McMahon, supra; Re Macdonnell, 11 Blatchf. 170; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 761.

The objections of counsel will be treated in the order of their presentation.

1. Should it appear upon the face of the warrant for the apprehension of the petitioner that the county judge was duly authorized by the chief executive of Texas to act as a committing magistrate? This contention of counsel originates in a misconception of the respective duties of a judicial officer, prescribed by the Statute, and those of a purely executive or administrative officer, as contemplated by the Treaty between the United States and republic of Mexico, concluded at Mexico December 11, 1861, and proclaimed by the President of the United States June 20, 1862. 13 Stat. at Large, 1199. The functions of the two officials are altogether distinct and different in their character. The judicial officer acts in obedience to the general laws regulating the international extradition of fugitives from justice, which supply the requisite judicial machinery to enable the national chief executive to discharge the obligations resting upon our government pursuant to treaty stipulations, thus investing him with the necessary power to preserve the national faith and protect the honor and dignity of the government. On the other hand, that state executive officer, under the Treaty with Mexico, is indebted solely to the Treaty for whatever power or authority he may possess, and his rights and corresponding duties are plainly limited and prescribed by its stipulations. While by force of the Statute and Treaty combined the functions of both officers may devolve upon, and be exercised by, one and the same individual, as appears to be the case here, there is no necessary relation between them. The individual may act in a dual capacity, but not necessarily. The two high contracting parties deemed it wise, in stipulating for the requisition and surrender of fugitives who had committed crimes in the frontier States, to clothe, in addition to the president, certain state officers with authority to act in that behalf. While thus acting, they are in no proper sense judicial officers, nor performing a judicial duty. In making the requisition they simply demand the surrender of a fugitive, and in effecting the surrender they deliver him up to the proper authorities after a prior judicial preliminary examination. It may be said—and at this day the soundness of the assertion will scarcely be doubted—that neither national nor state executive possesses the power, under the Treaty with Mexico, to surrender a fugitive to the Mexican authorities until a warrant has been judicially issued for his arrest, and an examination had, to the end that evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. No such extraordinary power will be found in the Treaty, and none such has place in the Statutes passed in aid of and to enforce our treaty obligations with foreign powers for the extradition of fugitive criminals. Reference to the Statutes and Treaty will verify the correctness of the foregoing views, and demonstrate the fallacy of the position assumed by counsel. “Whenever,” the Statute provides, “there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the government of the United States and any foreign government, any justice of the supreme court, circuit judge, district judge, commissioner authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States, or judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any State, may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person found within the limits of any State, district, or Territory, with having committed within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention, issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such justice, judge or commissioner, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. If, on such hearing, he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the secretary of state, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the treaty or convention; and he shall issue his warrant for the commitment of the person so charged to the proper jail, there to remain until such surrender shall be made.” Rev. Stat. § 5270.

As provided by the Statute, three classes of judicial officers may issue warrants for the apprehension of fugitives in proper cases arising under treaties,—federal judges, judges of state courts of record of general jurisdiction, and commissioners authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States. In the absence of treaty provisions upon the subject, the warrant of arrest must be issued by the official designated in the Statute. The Treaty with Mexico is silent upon the point. But counsel invoke article 4 in support of their contention. It is there provided:

“On the part of each country, the surrender of fugitives from justice shall be made only by the authority of the executive thereof, except in the case of crimes committed within the limits of the frontier States or Territories, in which latter case the surrender may be made by the chief civil authority thereof, or such chief civil or judicial authority of the districts or counties bordering on the frontier as may for this purpose be duly authorized by the said chief civil authority of the said frontier States or Territories; or if, from any cause, the civil authority of such State or Territory shall be suspended, then such surrender may be made by the chief military officer in command of such State or Territory.”

As before explained, the authority conferred by article 4 upon state officers is of an executive character; and it may be that, when the final act of surrender is made, which is the only duty contemplated by the article, the order issued for the purpose by the “chief civil or judicial authority of the districts or counties bordering on the frontier,” should affirmatively show that the officer effecting the surrender was duly authorized by the chief executive of the State. But in this case no order for the surrender of the petitioner has been issued, nor was one necessary or appropriate. The exigency had not arisen which demanded it. The warrant which was issued by the county judge was for the purpose of compelling the petitioner to appear and submit to a preliminary examination; and the fact that it was issued by an officer who styles himself “county judge and extradition agent, Cameron County, Texas,” is of no consequence. In performing the act the function was judicial, not executive. No extradition agent, as such, could issue a warrant of that nature; and, when the duty is performed by a proper state judge, the Statute makes it no more incumbent upon him to recite in the warrant the source of his authority than it does in those cases where the warrant issues by an associate justice, circuit or district judge of the United States. To sustain their views counsel refer to the case of Re Kelley, 25 Fed. Rep. 268. In that case it is held that the proceeding instituted under the Statute and Treaty with Great Britain is special, “and the fact that the commissioner (meaning United States commissioner) who issued the warrant is authorized so to do is jurisdictional, and must appear upon the face of the warrant.” See also Re Perez, 7 Blatchf. 34; Ex parte Lane, 6 Fed. Rep. 84; Spear, Extradition, 252, 258.

The correctness of the doctrine announced in the cases cited is not challenged. It applies strictly to commissioners, who have statutory power to act only when “authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States.” It has already been shown that no limitation of that kind applies to state judges of the class designated in the Statute. The authorities invoked by counsel are altogether inapplicable, having no reference to the precise point here involved. Upon the first question submitted, the court is of opinion that the position taken by counsel for the petitioner is manifestly untenable.

2. The second ground of objection assumes that the warrant cannot legally issue by the committing magistrate in the absence of a complaint made under oath. The Statute, which names the state judge as a proper officer to issue the warrant, also, in the same section, makes the sworn complaint a prerequisite to its issuance. It is provided by the Statute that the officer designated "may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person, . . . issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged." "This shows," says Judge Mitchell, "that without a sufficient complaint on oath there is no jurisdiction to issue the warrant." Further, he says: "It was argued that on habeas corpus the judge should not go beyond the warrant, and if that were regular he should not remand the prisoner. The answer to this is that the commissioner has no power to issue the warrant, and no jurisdiction under the Act of Congress, until a complaint on oath be made before him. Those, therefore, who oppose the discharge of the prisoner in order to show that there is a valid warrant are bound to show that it was issued on such complaint on oath, and to show this, they must produce the complaint. If when produced it shows its original invalidity, it must fall to the ground and the warrant with it." Re Heilbroun, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 486. See also Re Flores, supra; Re Henrich, 5 Blatchf. 414; Ex parte Lane, supra; Re Roth, 15 Fed. Rep. 507; Whart. Conf. Law, § 848; Spear, Extradition, p. 250; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 623, and note.

Authorities to show that the warrant should be supported by affidavit would seem to be superfluous. The language of the Statute is susceptible of but a single construction, and that, by its terms, a sworn complaint is indispensable as a basis for the warrant, admits of no question. In this respect the warrant cannot be aided by the Treaty, for the sufficient reason that the latter does not supply or provide for the machinery necessary to carry into effect the obligations of the respective governments. It is immaterial to the present inquiry that an extradition agent may have authority, under articles 2 and 4 of the Treaty, to make a requisition and effect a surrender. Neither these articles nor others of the Treaty give him, as such, or otherwise, power to issue warrants for the apprehension of a fugitive, the authority in that behalf being derived from the Statute. No complaint having been made under oath charging the petitioner with crime, the warrant issued by the county judge must be held invalid.

8. Does the Treaty with Mexico authorize the surrender of an American citizen to the Mexican government for punishment for crime committed within the jurisdiction of that republic? The judiciary is rarely called upon to decide questions of more magnitude and importance than those arising under treaty engagements involving the reciprocal rights and duties of independent governments. The court therefore approaches with diffidence the performance of so delicate a duty, and has exercised in this case unusual care and diligence in the endeavor to reach a just conclusion,—just to the two high contracting parties, and just to the petitioner, whose liberty is imperiled. It is believed that this precise question has not been determined by any of the courts, state or federal. In the case of Benson v. McMahon, supra, the supreme court had under consideration certain clauses of the Treaty with Mexico, but this point was not involved. The report of that case fails to disclose the citizenship of Benson, who was committed for extradition, and, presumably, he was not a citizen of the United States. The subject of the extradition of criminals has been a prolific source of discussion by jurists, publicists, writers upon international law and the executive departments of independent states; and, while the discussions disclose a conflict of opinion as to the duty imposed by the laws of nations touching the surrender by one nation to another of fugitives from the justice of the latter, the almost unbroken current of American authority and the practice of our own government go to show that the obligation to surrender does not exist in the absence of treaty engagements to that effect. In 1835 Judge Barbour, afterwards associate justice of the supreme court, had occasion to consider the question in the case of José Ferreira dos Santos, 2 Brock. 493. Referring to the opinions of Grotius, Burlamaqui, Heineccius, Vattel, Puffendorf and other writers and publicists, the learned judge adopts the view of Puffendorf, which he declares to be, "that the obligation to deliver up a criminal is rather in virtue of some treaty than in consequence of a common and indispensable obligation." On page 609, after a reference to certain treaties between France and other foreign powers, he proceeds: "Why, let me ask, were all these treaties in ancient and modern times? I answer, either because the opinion of Puffendorf was considered right, that without a treaty stipulation there was no obligation to surrender, or, at least, the question was so unsettled, the respective rights and obligations of nations so indeterminate, and the refusal on the part of nations to surrender so frequent, that without a treaty there was no obligation at all, or none of any sort of practical value; for what is this imperfect obligation of which the writers speak? It is the right of one to ask, which involves the right of the other to refuse, and, as applied to this particular subject, the refusal had become so common as to be almost the habitual practice, until treaties were formed concerning it."

He then examines the practice of our own and foreign governments, in reference to the subject of extradition of fugitives, and concludes, on page 513, with the expression of opinion "that the government of the United States are not under any obligation to deliver the prisoner, in the absence of any treaty stipulation."

Holmes v. Jennison came before the Supreme Court in 1840, two years before the Extradition Treaty with Great Britain in 1842. Discussing that case, Mr. Chief Justice Taney says: "Since the expiration of the Treaty with Great Britain, negotiated in 1793, the general government appears to have adopted the policy of refusing to surrender persons who, having committed offenses in a foreign nation, have taken shelter in this. It is believed that the general government has entered into no treaty stipulations upon this subject since the one above mentioned, and in every instance where there was no engagement by treaty to deliver, and a demand has been made, they have uniformly refused, and have denied the right of the executive to surrender, because there was no treaty, and no law of Congress to authorize it. And, acting upon this principle throughout, they have never demanded from a foreign government anyone who fled from this country in order to escape from the punishment due his crimes." 89 U. S. 14 Pet. 574, 10 L. ed. 598.

In 1845 Judge Woodbury, in the Case of the British Prisoners, holds a similar view: "But without such a stipulation, however fit it might seem in point of morals to surrender citizens of other countries to answer for offenses committed at home against their own laws, it is usually considered that there is no political obligation under the laws of nations to do it." Re Sheazle, 1 Woodb. & M. 688.

In the same year (1845) the question was considered by Mr. Buchanan, secretary of state, in a communication to Mr. Wise, in which the following language is employed: "But the practice of nations tolerates no right of extradition. Whatever elementary authors may say to the contrary, one nation is not bound to deliver up persons accused of crimes who have escaped into its territories on the demand of another nation against whose laws the alleged crime was committed. The government of the United States has from the very beginning acted upon this principle. Mr. Jefferson, when secretary of state under the administration of General Washington, declared that 'the laws of this country take no notice of crimes committed out of their jurisdiction. The most atrocious offender, coming within their pale, is received by them as an innocent man, and they have authorized no one else to seize and deliver him up.' . . . The truth is that it has been for a long time well settled, both by the law and practice of nations, that without a treaty stipulation one government is not under any obligation to surrender a fugitive from justice to another government for trial." 2 Wharton, Int. Law Dig. pp. 745, 746.

In the year 1847, in Re Metzger, Mr. Justice McLean, as the organ of the Supreme Court, says: "The surrender of fugitives from justice is a matter of conventional arrangement between States, as no such obligation is imposed by the laws of nations. 46 U. S. 5 How. 188, 12 L. ed. 109.

In a communication of Mr. Cushing, attorney-general, to the President, in 1853, he thus states the principle: "It is the settled politic doctrine of the United States that, independently of special compact, no State is bound to deliver up fugitives from the justice of another State. . . . It is true any State may, in its discretion, do this as a matter of international comity towards the foreign State, but all such discretion is of inconvenient exercise in a constitutional republic organized as is the Federal Union; and accordingly it is the received policy of this government to refuse to grant extradition except in virtue of express stipulations to that effect." People v. Wing, 6 Ops. Atty-Gen. 86; Id. 432.

"The ancient doctrine," says the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in 1878, "that a sovereign state is bound by the laws of nations to deliver up persons charged with or convicted of crimes committed in another country, upon the demand of the State whose laws they have violated, never did permanently obtain in the United States. It was supported by jurists of distinction, like Kent and Story, but the doctrine has long prevailed with us that a foreign government has no right to demand the surrender of a violator of its laws, unless we are under obligations to make the surrender in obedience to the stipulations of an existing treaty. . . . As said by Mr. Cushing, in Re Hamilton, a fugitive from justice of the State of Indiana: 'It is the established rule of the United States neither to grant nor to ask for extradition of criminals as between us and any foreign government, unless in cases for which stipulation is made by express convention.'" Com. v. Hawes, 18 Bush, 708, 709.

Mr. Spear, in his work, already cited, page 18, after reviewing the authorities, expresses his conclusion in the following words: "The preponderance of authority derived from practice, the legislation of Congress, the opinions of the attorney-generals of the United States, and the deliverances of the judiciary, both state and federal, clearly show that no department of the general government is either bound or authorized to deliver up fugitive criminals from other countries, except in those cases for which provision is made by treaty. The powers of the government are bestowed by the Constitution; and, except as it may be clothed with the extradition power through treaties, no such power is found among the express or implied grants to Congress, or among those to the executive department, or among the powers given to the federal judiciary. There can be no discretion in the exercise of the power, since it does not exist at all. See also Blandford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 627; United States v. Watts, 14 Fed. Rep. 180; Wharton, Conf. Laws, § 885; Woods, Int. Law, § 79; 2 Wharton, Int. Law Dig. § 268; Wheaton, Int. Law, 9th ed. pp. 176, 177; Hawes v. United States, 16 Alb. L. J. 861, 866; 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 600, and notes.

In 1886, the Supreme Court, discussing the question of extradition of fugitives, observes: "It is only in modern times that the nations of the earth have imposed upon themselves the obligation of delivering up these fugitives from justice to the States where their crimes were committed, for trial and punishment. This has been done generally by treaties made by one independent government with another. Prior to these treaties, and apart from them, it may be stated, as the general result of the writers upon international law, that there was no well-defined obligation on one country to deliver up such fugitives to another; and, though such delivery was often made, it was upon the principle of comity, and within the discretion of the government whose action was invoked, and it has never been recognized as among those obligations of one government towards another which rest upon established principles of international law." United States v. Rauscher, 119 U. S. 411, 412, 80 L. ed. 426.

In this connection it is worthy of remark that, since the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Taney was written, in which the belief is expressed that the United States, "in every instance where there was no engagement by treaty to deliver," have uniformly refused and denied the right of the executive to surrender, the exceptional case is reported of the surrender, in the absence of a treaty, of Don José Augustin Argüelles by Mr. Seward to the Spanish government. Referring to this case it is said by Mr. Wharton (2 Int. Law Dig. p. 746) that "in Argüelles Case, 1864 [U. S. Dip. Corr. 1864, pt. 2, 60-74] (cited in Wharton, Conf. Laws, § 941; Spear, Extradition, 1), the defendant was delivered to the Spanish government by Mr. Seward without a treaty, and the proceedings were so summary as to prevent a review on habeas corpus." In his comments upon the case Mr. Spear says:

"The delivery of Argüelles, being wholly without any legal authority, was not at all excusable by the fact that the alleged fugitive was supposed to be guilty of a heinous offense. This supposition, if true, does not change the principle or the nature of the act. Rules of law do not vary with the merits or demerits of the particular case to which they are applied." Spear, Extradition, p. 18.

While, therefore, investigation discloses that Chancellor Kent, of our own country, and several distinguished publicists and writers upon international law of foreign countries, assert, apart from treaty engagements, the obligation to surrender a fugitive from justice, the overwhelming weight of American authority and the practice of our government are clearly in the opposite direction, and deny the existence of any obligation to surrender arising out of the law of nations. What, then, was the result? Treaties for the extradition of fugitive criminals, under certain circumstances, were concluded by the United States with foreign powers, and these treaties, in the terms of article 6 of the Constitution, are declared to be the supreme law of the land; and as such supreme law they are to be construed as other laws. "A treaty," says the Supreme Court, "then, is a law of the land as an Act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined; and when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute." Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 598, 599, 28 L. ed. 803, 804; United States v. Rauscher, supra. In interpreting treaties, "we are to find out the intention of the parties by just rules of interpretation applied to the subject matter; and, having found that, our duty is to follow it as far as it goes, and to stop where that stops, whatever may be the imperfections or difficulties which it leaves behind." The Amiable Isabella, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 71, 5 L. ed. 208. See also Cheong Hoong v. United States, 112 U. S. 536, 28 L. ed. 770.

It is said: "There is no rule of construction better settled, either in relation to covenants between individuals or treaties between nations, than that the whole instrument containing the stipulations is to be taken together, and that all articles in pari materia should be considered as parts of the same stipulation." 2 Wharton, Int. Law Dig. p. 29.

The Treaty with Mexico being supreme law, it is the duty of courts to take judicial notice of it, and to enforce private rights, when appropriately presented, growing out of its stipulations. The court will therefore proceed to inquire into the construction of the Treaty, in order to determine whether our government has authority to surrender the petitioner. If the authority exist, she could not complain of its exercise in a proceeding conforming in all respects to legal requirements. In the absence of such authority, she should not for a moment be restrained by the strong arm of the law, however regular in other respects the proceedings might be, or however heinous the offense of which she is accused. Agreeably to its caption, the Treaty is one "between the United States of America and the United Mexican states for the extradition of criminals." The introductory clause is as follows:

"The United States of America and the United Mexican states, having adjudged it expedient, with a view to the better administration of justice and to the prevention of crime within their respective territories and jurisdiction, that persons charged with the crimes hereinafter enumerated, and being fugitives from justice, should, under certain circumstances, be reciprocally delivered up, have resolved to conclude a treaty for this purpose.

"Article 1. It is agreed that the contracting parties shall, on requisition made in their names . . . deliver up to justice persons who, being accused of the crimes enumerated in article third of the present Treaty, committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party, shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other.

"Art. 3. Persons shall be so delivered up who shall be charged, according to the provisions of this Treaty, with any of the following crimes, whether as principals, accessories or accomplices, to wit: murder (including assassination, parricide, infanticide and poisoning).

"Art. 6. The provisions of the present Treaty shall not be applied in any manner to any crime or offense of a purely political character, nor shall it embrace the return of fugitive slaves, nor the delivery of criminals who, when the offense was committed, shall have been held in the place where the offense was committed in the condition of slaves, the same being expressly forbidden by the constitution of Mexico; nor shall the provisions of the present Treaty be applied in any manner to the crimes enumerated in the third article committed anterior to the date of the exchange of the ratifications hereof.

"Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this Treaty." 12 Stat. at L. pp. 1199-1202.

The foregoing extracts embrace all the treaty stipulations which in any manner affect the present inquiry. What, then, was the purpose and intention of the two governments in inserting the stipulation: "Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this Treaty?" We have seen that, with substantial unanimity, American jurists and statesmen recognized, under the law of nations, no obligations to surrender a fugitive, whether citizen or alien, and that by our government it was never done except in few, if more than one, isolated instances. Hence the resulting necessity to enter into treaty engagements for that purpose. Hence the Extradition Statute of 1848 and amendments, embodied in Rev. Stat., § 5270 et seq., which, in conjunction with treaties, the Supreme Court affirms in Rauscher's Case, supra, "are in their nature exclusive." If there were no pre-existing obligation to extradite a fugitive, the obligation must necessarily grow out of either statute law or treaty engagement. It is therefore apparent that the purpose of the treaty was to authorize the parties to do something which they had no previous authority to do. The parties come together through their respective representatives, and make an agreement,—an obligatory, binding agreement—to surrender, under certain circumstances, persons who commit crimes and flee from offended justice. They are authorized to act as they bind themselves. The agreement is mutual, the rights and obligations reciprocal. If power to surrender be not affirmatively given, the right to demand a fugitive can have no existence. The right to demand implies, ex vi termini, the corresponding authority and obligation to surrender. But both to exist should be founded upon express stipulations. The agreement here is, in article 1 of the Treaty, that the contracting parties shall, on requisition made in their name, deliver up persons, who, being accused of crimes, etc. "Persons," without qualification, would necessarily include all persons, citizens and aliens alike; and, under that general designation, the executive, it is believed, could not lawfully withhold the surrender of an American citizen upon requisition made by the republic of Mexico. But the Treaty does not stop there. A subsequent limiting clause denies the obligation to surrender a citizen: "Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this Treaty." The obligation to deliver being denied, upon what can rest the authority? It did not exist in our government, as already shown independent of treaty engagements, or, if existing as a mere matter of comity or courtesy, there was no lawful mode of enforcing it; and certainly it finds no countenance either in the Constitution or Laws of Congress. The former is silent as to extradition, considered from an international stand-point, and simply confers the general power to make treaties, from which springs the right of the treaty-making power to negotiate with foreign governments for the extradition of fugitives. All the inferences and deductions to be drawn from the statutes would seem clearly to support the view taken by the court; that is, there should be a binding treaty stipulation to authorize the executive to surrender a fugitive. The first Act of Congress on the subject was approved August 12, 1848. Its caption reads: "An Act for Giving Effect to Certain Treaty Stipulations between This and Foreign Governments, for the Apprehension and Delivering up of Certain Offenders." 9 Stat. at L. 802. Section 5270, Rev. Stat., which is, in substance, the same as the first section of the Act of 1848, provides that, if the officer upon the preliminary hearing deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge, "he shall certify the same . . . to the secretary of state, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the Treaty or convention." The warrant for surrender does not issue according to the will or discretion of the executive, but agreeably to the stipulations of the Treaty; that is to say, according as the parties have obligated themselves by treaty engagements. If it were otherwise, if the executive could at his option and in his discretion transport for trial to a foreign country a person accused of crime, he would in such cases exercise a power which, it is thought, finds no sanction under our constitutional form of government. While nations are not careful to screen criminals seeking an asylum in their midst, personal liberty is so jealously guarded by the American Constitution that its safety and security should not be dependent upon the exercise of the arbitrary will and discretion of any official, however lofty his official station. The Statute, therefore, employing apt words to confine the warrant of surrender to that class of persons and offenses as to which the parties have entered into binding treaty stipulations, should be held to exclude other classes, and to deny authority or discretion to surrender where the obligation is by treaty expressly denied. United States v. Rauscher, supra, is referred to in support of this view. While the questions in the two cases are dissimilar, the general principles underlying the Case of Rauscher have direct application to the case before the court.

It will not be amiss to refer, as germane to the proposition discussed, to the extradition treaties concluded between the United States and foreign nations. By the author, 7 Am & Eng. Encyclop. Law, published in 1889, it is stated there were at that time in force thirty-three of such treaties. They are chronologically arranged as follows: Great Britain, 1843; France, 1843; Hawaiian Islands, 1849; Swiss Confederation, 1850; Prussia and other states, 1852; Bremen, 1853; Bavaria, 1853; Wurtemberg, 1853; Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 1853; Mecklenburg-Strelitz, 1853; Oldenburg, 1853; Schaumburg-Lippe, 1854; Hanover, 1855; Two Sicilies, 1855; Austria, 1856; Baden, 1857; Sweden and Norway, 1860; Venezuela, 1860; Mexico, 1861; Hayti, 1864; Dominican Republic, 1867; Italy, 1868; Republic of Salvador, 1870; Nicaragua, 1870; Peru, 1870; Orange Free State, 1871; Ecuador, 1872; The Ottoman Empire, 1874; Spain, 1877; Netherlands, 1880; Belgium, 1882; Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, 1883; Empire of Japan, 1896. Those with Prussia, Bremen, Bavaria, Wurttemberg, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Schaumburg-Lippe, Hanover, Austria, Baden, Hayti, Peru, The Ottoman Empire, Spain, The Netherlands, and Belgium contain a stipulation substantially in the very words (the meaning being precisely the same) of the concluding clause of the sixth article of the Treaty with Mexico, to wit: "Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens under the stipulations of this Treaty." The corresponding clause in the Treaties with the Two Sicilies, Sweden and Norway, and the republic of Salvador, is as follows:

The Two Sicilies. "Art. 24. The citizens and subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall remain exempt from the stipulations of the preceding articles, so far as they relate to the surrender of fugitive criminals."

Sweden and Norway. "Art. 4. Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up, under the stipulations of this convention, any person who, according to the laws of the country where he shall be found, is a citizen or a subject of the same at the time his surrender is demanded."

Republic of Salvador. "Art 5. In no case and for no motive shall the high contracting parties be obliged to deliver up their own subjects." Spear, Extradition, 575-628; Rev. Stat., relating to District of Columbia post-roads and public treaties.

A similar clause is not contained in any of the other Treaties above mentioned. The preamble to the Treaty with Prussia and several other states contains the recital:

"Whereas, the laws and constitution of Prussia and of the other German states, parties to this convention, forbid them to surrender their own citizens to a foreign jurisdiction, the government of the United States, with the view of making the convention strictly reciprocal, shall be held equally free from any obligation to surrender citizens of the United States."

It is apparent the recital, which is but the reason assigned by Prussia for refusing to extradite her citizens, does nothing more than relieve the United States from the obligation to surrender. But the clause in article 3, already quoted, which embodies the agreement of the parties, the binding part of the compact, goes further, and, in effect, denies the right of either party to deliver up its own citizens. Such is the view entertained of this particular clause by Mr. Wharton. "If a German," he asserts, "comes to us, commits a crime, and then returns to his own land, though we cannot demand his surrender, yet he may be punished, and restitution awarded, under proceedings from his own sovereign. But if an American goes to Germany, and there is guilty of a crime against the territorial law, and returns to America, his offense goes unpunished. He cannot be punished by us, because our courts take no jurisdiction of offenses committed abroad against foreign laws. He cannot be surrendered to Germany, because our Treaties with Germany expressly prohibit such surrender." Wharton, Conf. Laws, 2d ed. § 841, note 3. And in the text, same section, he further says: "An exception to this effect exists in our Treaties with Prussia and the North-German states, with Bavaria, Baden, with Norway and Sweden, with Mexico, with Austria, and with other states to be hereafter specified."

As indicating the construction given by Mr. Lawrence, a writer of distinction, to the clause of the Treaty in question, he makes the following classification of our Extradition Treaties: "(1) those excepting the subjects of the other contracting power; (2) those containing no such exception." Under the first are embraced the Treaties with Mexico, Prussia and others. The second includes those with Great Britain, Switzerland, etc. Wharton, Conf. Laws, § 857, notes. To the same effect see 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 616, 617, par. 11. "Some of the Extradition Treaties of the United States," says Mr. Spear, "expressly provide that neither party shall be required to deliver up its own citizens, which is equivalent to saying that neither will, in respect to such citizens, furnish any facility to the other for bringing them to justice for any offense which they may commit against its laws; and hence, if, under such a treaty, either party should by mistake deliver up one of its citizens, it clearly would not be allowable for the other to put that citizen on trial upon the pretext that the terms of the treaty relate only to the extradition, and have no relation whatever to the trial, either as to the person or to the offense to be tried." Spear, Extradition, 79.

All of our law-writers, without an exception, brought to the attention of the court, concur in the opinion that the sixth article of the Treaty with Mexico forbids the United States from surrendering their own citizens. Nor is there less uniformity in the practical construction given that article by the department of state. And such construction by a department of the government charged with the administration of a law, although not binding upon the courts, should properly receive great weight when the law is sought to be judicially construed. The rule should apply with special force to that class of cases where, like the one before the court, the national chief executive, acting through the state department, is endued with the ultimate power of withholding the final warrant for surrender of the fugitive. Rev. Stat. §§ 5270, 5272; Re Stupp, 11 Blatchf. 125, and note; Spear, Extradition, 245, 246. The proposition asserted is sustained by numerous authorities. Mr. Justice Harlan, in United States v. Johnston, clearly states the principle: "In view of the foregoing facts, the case comes fairly within the rule, often announced by this court, that the contemporaneous construction of a statute by those charged with its execution, especially when it has long prevailed, is entitled to great weight, and should not be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons, and unless it be clear that such construction is erroneous." 124 U. S. 253, 81 L. ed. 398.

Says the court in United States v. Hill: "In the construction of a doubtful and ambiguous law, the contemporary construction of those who were called upon to act under the law, and were appointed to carry its provisions into effect, is entitled to very great respect." 120 U. S. 182, 80 L. ed. 632. United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 59, 80 L. ed. 561.

The same doctrine was applied in Brown v. United States, where it is said: "It must be conceded that, were the question a new one, the true construction of the section would be open to doubt. But the findings of the court of claims show that soon after the enactment of the Act the president and the navy department construed the section to include warrant as well as commissioned officers, and that they have since that time uniformly adhered to that construction, and that under its provisions large numbers of warrant officers have been retired. This contemporaneous and uniform interpretation is entitled to weight in the construction of the law, and in a case of doubt ought to turn the scale." 118 U. S. 570, 571, 28 L. ed. 1079; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. State, 77 Tex. 388; United States v. Payne, 8 Fed. Rep. 893.

To the consideration, then, of the practice of the state department in construing the last clause of the sixth article of the Treaty the attention of the court will be next briefly directed.

(1) In 1874, says Mr. Frelinghuysen, in discussing the Trimble Case, a Mexican, Francisco Perez, charged with the murder of Joseph Alexander, an American, at Brownsville, Tex., escaped into Mexico, and Mr. Fish, secretary of state, declined to prefer a formal requisition to the Mexican government for the surrender of the fugitive.

(2) The Mexican authorities in 1884 made demand on our government for the extradition of Alexander Trimble, a citizen of the United States, who was accused of crimes committed in the republic of Mexico. The secretary of state, Mr. Frelinghuysen, construing the Treaty as inhibiting the surrender of an American citizen, refused to deliver up Trimble. In a carefully prepared opinion in that case he states his conclusion in the following words: "I understand the Treaty with Mexico as reading thus: 'The president shall be bound to surrender any person guilty of crime, unless such person is a citizen of the United States.'" Senate Ex. Doc. No. 98, 1st Sess. 48th Cong.

(3) Charles Hudson, an American citizen, was held in Texas, in 1888, for extradition to Mexico on a charge of robbery committed in that republic. In response to a letter from the governor of Texas, Mr. Bayard, secretary of state, replies:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant in relation to the case of Charles Hudson, held in Texas for extradition to Mexico on a charge of robbery. It being alleged that Hudson is a citizen of the United States, you request to be informed whether the department will adhere to its former ruling in the Trimble Case, since that ruling, if applied to the case in question, might prevent the extradition of the prisoner, and render futile the efforts and expenditures of the Mexican government to obtain his surrender. As the decision of the department in the Trimble Case is understood, it was held that as, under the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico, 'neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens,' the president would not be authorized, in the absence of an express grant of power under the laws of the United States, to surrender to Mexico a citizen of the United States. The treaty provision referred to, which is found similarly stated in many of our extradition treaties, was held to negative any obligation to surrender, and thus to leave the authorities of this government without authority to act in such a case. After due consideration, the department is of opinion that the construction given to the Trimble Case is correct." (See letter on file in department of state, Austin, Tex.)

(4) More recently, and within the past sixty days, the question was considered by Mr. Blaine, present secretary of state, whose letter to Hon. W. H. Crain is published in the public prints. Dr. Martinez, it is said, was basely assassinated on the streets of Laredo, Tex., by persons who fled to Mexico. On behalf of citizens of Laredo, Mr. Crain requested the state department to take steps looking to the extradition of the assassins. That portion of the secretary's letter deemed pertinent to the present question reads as follows:

"The department regrets that the present conventional relations between the United States and Mexico do not admit of a demand for the extradition of the assassins, since it is stated they are citizens of Mexico. Present Treaty provides that neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its citizens, and, as this clause has been held to preclude the surrender of a citizen of the United States, Mexico refuses to give up her citizens. This question was last agitated in the well-known case of Alexander Trimble and his associates, who were charged with murder and robbery in 1884. They were arrested in Texas with a view of their extradition by authorities of that State, and when the case was reported to their government, and the fact of their citizenship of the United States was disclosed, this department interfered and they were discharged. In view of this, and several prior and subsequent cases in which a similar construction has been given to the Treaty, this government is precluded from demanding the extradition of the fugitives in the present instance."

Thus it appears that, extending through a period of seventeen years, four different administrations of the federal government have invariably held that no authority was conferred upon the executive, by the sixth article of the Treaty, either to demand of the Mexican authorities the extradition of their subjects committing crimes in the United States, or to surrender an American citizen upon demand made by the republic of Mexico. Following the construction so consistently applied to the Treaty, the executive department, whose appropriate duty it is to execute the Treaty pursuant to its stipulations and statutory requirements, has uniformly refused to surrender our own citizens; and it may be well said, if doubt exist as to the true construction of the Treaty, which the court freely admits is not entertained in the present case, this contemporaneous and uniform interpretation "ought to turn the scale." So far as the court is advised, there is but one opinion of the question by law-writers and the executive department of our own country. Nor can it be accurately said that the Mexican courts have authoritatively placed a different construction upon the Treaty. There is but a single instance known to the court where the question was brought to the attention of their judicial tribunals. That is a case referred to by Mr. Foster, minister to Mexico, in a communication to Mr. Evarts, secretary of state, which will be found but imperfectly reported in 1 Ex. Doc. (3d Sess. 45th Cong.) 1878-79, pp. 560-567. It appears therefrom that in 1877 two persons, Dominguez and Barrera, accused of murder in Texas, fled to Mexico, and the authorities of Texas applied to those of the state of Tamaulipas for their extradition. "They were arrested, and their delivery ordered by the federal executive through the department of war. But the prisoners applied to the district judge of Matamoras for amparo, or protection, a proceeding somewhat similar to our writ of habeas corpus, which application the judge sustained; a decision based upon the ground that, as Mexican citizens, extradition would be a violation of the individual guaranties of the Federal Constitution. An appeal was taken by the prosecuting attorney from this decision and the case was thus brought before the federal supreme court. After a lengthy discussion of the case, and a consideration of all the constitutional, international and political questions either involved or introduced, in which almost all of the magistrates of the court participated, the decision of the district judge of Matamoras was reversed, and the court decided by a vote of 9 to 5, that the individual guaranties of the Mexican Constitution would not be violated by the extradition of the criminals." See Mr. Foster's letter, p. 560. Whether the prisoners were eventually delivered up to the Texas authorities is not disclosed by the report. But it does appear that there was no order made for their surrender, nor for their discharge. They were simply held for the purpose of inquiring into the question of their citizenship. Mr. Foster inclosed with his report opinions of only two of the judges, Chief Justice Vallarta and Magistrate Ramirez, and a brief extract from the opinion of Magistrate Bautista. No other opinions appear in the volume referred to. Chief Justice Vallarta and Magistrate Ramirez discussed the question, among others, of the authority of the Mexican government, under the sixth article of the Treaty, to surrender its citizens to the United States upon demand made by the proper officers. Upon that point Magistrate Ramirez says: "I think, also, that while our Federal Constitution and the Extradition Treaty of December 11, 1861, are in force, the executive power cannot consent to the extradition of any Mexican citizen." The chief justice maintained the contrary view, holding a Mexican citizen to be subject to extradition. The reasoning and conclusions of both judges are entitled to respectful consideration, but they are in no manner controlling upon our courts; and certainly in no event would the mere expression of opinion upon a collateral question establish a precedent to be followed by other tribunals. What was said was mere dicta, obviously apparent from the language of the chief justice: "A case," says he, "of the extradition of Mexicans, as I have said, is not treated here. The evidence of documents exists to the effect that the order issued by the department of war was given in the understanding that Dominguez and Barrera were American citizens, and that General Canales consulted the government in regard to this point." The interpretation of the Treaty by the executive branch of our government, and its unbroken practice in obedience thereto, the opinions of our law-writers, the logical deductions fairly drawn from the application of established rules of construction, and finally all these, supplemented by a protesting minority of the Federal Supreme Court of Mexico, stand opposed to the views of Chief Justice Vallarta. That criminals should be punished, and that nations should render to each other all lawful assistance in their power to effectuate that end, may be readily conceded. But ours is a government of law, and the rights, powers and prerogatives of the executive are derived from the Constitution and statutes and treaties made in pursuance thereof. If these deny, or do not confer, authority to surrender a citizen to a foreign state, then its exercise would be but the exertion of usurped power. Borrowing the words of Mr. Frelinghuysen: "It would be a great evil that those guilty of high crime, whether American citizens or not, should go unpunished; but even that result could not justify an usurpation of power." Nor is judicial usurpation less reprehensible. Both are wrong; both defy the law, and are repugnant to the genius of our institutions.

It is cause for regret that this case cannot reach the supreme court, to whose judgment the questions involved should be remitted for final and conclusive determination. But that fact should not deter the trial court from the performance of its duty. If the prisoner be unlawfully restrained of her liberty, an order for her enlargement should be entered without hesitation.

Being of opinion, for the reasons given, (1) that the warrant issued by the county judge for the arrest of the petitioner is void;

(3) that her surrender is not authorized by the Treaty with Mexico,—it results that her detention is illegal, and she should therefore be discharged from custody; and it is so ordered.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

R. D. WHEELER

v.

E. SELDEN.

(.....Vt.....)

On an exchange by husband and wife of his wagon for her sleigh, which were both kept before and after in a barn leased by him, there is no such change of possession as will uphold her title to the wagon against the husband's creditors.

(March 20, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a judgment of the City Court for the City of Burlington in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of a wagon. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. L. F. Wilbur and D. J. Foster, for defendant:

There is nothing in the case to show, nor is any claim made, that the exchange was in fraud of the husband's creditors; it therefore vested a perfect title in the wife. She owned the wagon from the time of the exchange, and as no other question is raised the defendant is entitled to judgment.

Leavitt v. Jones, 54 Vt. 428.

So long as the wagon remained in the barn in Burlington, there was an apparent concurrent possession, but under the circumstances disclosed by the case, a candid observer would be bound to say that Mrs. Arnold had the chief control, and that is all that is necessary to protect her title. So far as appears from the case, Mr. Arnold owned nothing in Burlington but the wagon, at the time of the exchange, and after the exchange he owned nothing there.

Flanagan v. Wood, 38 Vt. 332; Hall v. Parsons, 17 Vt. 271.

The transaction being a bona fide one, she acquired the property at the time of the exchange, and nothing further is required under sec. 3 of No. 140, Acts of 1884.

White v. Waisie, 47 Vt. 502; Spooner v. Reynolds, 50 Vt. 487.

All the law requires is that such a change of possession be had as the circumstances of the parties and the property sold render practicable, and such a change was had in this case.

Murray v. Chadwick, 53 Vt. 293; Lyndon v. Belden, 14 Vt. 428.

Messrs. W. L. Burnap and J. J. Enright, for plaintiff.

Tyler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case shows that Arnold and his wife resided in Burlington, upon premises owned by the latter; that Arnold was the lessee of a barn situated in another part of the city, in which were kept a sleigh, owned by the wife, and the wagon in controversy, owned by Arnold; that, while the property was thus situated, they made an exchange by which the sleigh became Arnold's and the wagon the wife's, the wagon, when not in use, remaining in the barn, as before. Previous to the exchange Arnold had been accustomed to use the wagon in going to and returning from his farm in South Burlington, and for other purposes. Mrs. Arnold also frequently used it after the exchange, as she had done prior thereto. On an occasion when Arnold had the wagon at his farm, it was attached by the plaintiff as a deputy-sheriff on a writ in favor of a creditor of Arnold, and while in the officer's possession, by virtue of the attachment, it was taken away by the defendant, acting as Mrs. Arnold's agent, and upon claim of her title to the property. Judgment was obtained by the creditor against Arnold in the suit upon which the attachment was made, and an execution was issued and returned by the plaintiff unsatisfied. It is conceded that the wife acquired a good title to the wagon as against her husband. As we construe the exceptions, the question raised is in relation to her ownership of it as against her husband's creditors. The defendant's counsel refer to Leavitt v. Jones, 54 Vt. 428; but in that case it was only held that a wife, purchasing personal property with her own money from her husband can hold it as her separate property, and that her title is only liable to be defeated by her husband's creditors if all the requirements of the law necessary to render the sale and transfer valid as against such creditors are not complied with. The rule in this State is well understood by the profession

NOTE.—Fraudulent transactions between husband and wife.

Where a husband gave to his wife a carriage, a sleigh and a billiard table, but there was no recorded conveyance, and no visible change of possession, and the property continued to be used by all the members of the family as such articles are ordinarily used, it was held that the conveyance was invalid as against existing creditors of the husband. McAfee v. Busby, 69 Iowa, 328; Smith v. Hewett, 12 Iowa, 94; Odell v. Lee, 14 Iowa, 411.

Transfers of property and contracts made directly between the husband and wife are regarded as void. Porter v. Wakefield, 5 New Eng. Rep. 492, 146 Mass. 25, citing Motte v. Alger, 15 Gray, 322; Ed- 12 L. R. A.

gerly v. Whalan, 106 Mass. 7507; Stetson v. O'Sullivan, 8 Allen, 321; Butler v. Ives, 139 Mass. 205; Roby v. Phelon, 118 Mass. 541; Atlantic Nat. Bank v. Tavener, 130 Mass. 407; Fowle v. Torrey, 135 Mass. 87; Knell v. Eggleston, 1 New Eng. Rep. 455, 140 Mass. 202; Woodward v. Spurr, 3 New Eng. Rep. 232, 142 Mass. 283.

In New York, husband and wife are authorized to make conveyances and contracts of and concerning personal property to and with each other, in the same manner and to the same effect as if they were strangers. Waterman v. Mackenzie, 139 U. S. 252, 34 L. ed. 223, 54 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1562, citing Armitage v. Mace, 95 N. Y. 538; Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381. See note to Deshon v. Wood (Mass.) 1 L. R. A. 519.

that, to render a sale of personal property valid against the vendor's creditors, there must be a change of possession of the property from the vendor to the vendee; that the vendee's possession must be exclusive and apparent. Weeks v. Prescott, 53 Vt. 57.

Where there is a joint possession by the vendor and the vendee, the property is liable to attachment upon the vendor's debts if a candid observer would be at a loss to determine which of the two has the chief control and possession of it; and, in case of doubt, the law resolves the doubt against the party who should make the change of possession open and visible. Flanagan v. Wood, 83 Vt. 382.

The reason of the rule, which is to prevent fraudulent transfers of property, applies more strongly to transactions between husbands and wives than to those between other persons because of the greater facility for the commission of frauds of this character between the former. No. 140, Acts 1884, is cited by the defendant's counsel as affording ground for his claim that there was a sufficient change of possession of this property. That Act was designed to enable married women to make contracts the same as if sole, and to protect their personal estate from their husband's creditors. It is true, however, that prior to the passage of this Act a husband could make a valid sale of personal property to his wife, and that a married woman could acquire as perfect a title to such property from her husband as she could from a stranger. Leavitt v. Jones, supra. The Act referred to does not prescribe what shall be a sufficient change of possession of property in case of such sale, and it in no wise relaxes or varies the rule above stated.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Elsie A. HARVEY

v.

Lauren H. CRANE, Plff. in Err.

(....Mich.....)

A fence may be maintained along a statutory private road across the farm of another person when necessary to the owner's reasonable enjoyment of the road, as for instance where it is used as a passageway for stock, especially where the owner of the soil has land only on one side of the road.

(April 17, 1891.)

NOTE.—Statutory provisions on the subject of fencing.

It is a fundamental principle of the common law, as indicated in numerous decisions, that no man is bound to fence his close against the encroachments of his neighbor's cattle; and that the owner of animals must restrain their trespassing upon his neighbor. In effect, however, this rule has no application in this country as by statutory innovation, regulations are prescribed for the control and adjustment of these matters. These statutory provisions, while employing a widely variant phraseology, are expressive of the same intent, and require substantially that the occupants of lands which are inclosed by fences must maintain such fences between their own and abutting inclosures, in equal shares, in order to protect each from the depredations of the other's stock. In support of this proposition, see Ala. Rev. Code 1887; Dig. 1888, chap. 78; Laws 1878, chap. 87; Ark. Rev. Stat. chap. 96; Conn. Gen. Stat. Rev. 1886, 448 et seq.; 1 Hittell's Dig. Cal. § 8086.

This is not affected by Code. See § 19, subd. 28, Pol. Code 1872; Ill. Stat. Rev. Code 1882, p. 158; 1 Ill. Gross Stat. chap. 51; 1 Ind. Rev. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Washtenaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by defendant in entering upon plaintiff's private way and removing a fence. Affirmed.

Mr. A. J. Sawyer, with Mr. F. Hinckley, for plaintiff in error:

When the owner of the easement attempts to make an inclosure thereof, where his stock may pasture as well as pass over it, and to exclude the owner of the fee from all use thereof, he has converted it to uses and purposes other than a road.

Stat. chaps. 23, 102; Va. Code 1860, chap. 99; W. Va. Code 1868, chap. 60; 1 Taylor, Stat. (Wis.) chap. 17.

Where one party ceases to improve his land, or throws it open to the commons, he must not take away any part of his partition fence adjoining the next improved inclosure if the owner or occupant of such inclosure elects to pay its value within a reasonable time, which is generally fixed by statute. Thompson, Law of the Farm, § 237, note.

The statutes of the several States have provisions more or less explicit to this effect.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of Illinois that a partition fence, whether existing by agreement, acquiescence or statutory provision, cannot be removed until the parties interested in its remaining are properly notified of the intended removal. McCormick v. Tate, 30 Ill. 384.

Rights of the owner of the fee.

The plaintiff, as owner of the soil, has all the rights and benefits of ownership consistent with such an easement (Atkins v. Bordman, 2 Met. 457; Bakeman v. Talbot, 31 N. Y. 371); among others must be the right to have his lands fenced or unfenced at his pleasure. In the absence of fences his horses and cattle must not obstruct the defendant's way; and the defendant is bound to the exercise of due and reasonable care by his own methods to prevent his cattle or other animals from tres-

The owner of the soil is under no obligation to fence along a highway unless he pleases, except as required by statute.

Williams v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 2 Mich. 259; Wood v. La Rue, 9 Mich. 159; Gardner v. Smith, 7 Mich. 410.

The owner of the soil over which an easement exists, either as a right of way, or a right to flow, has all the rights and benefits of ownership consistent therewith. He has the right to the herbage growing thereon, and can use it for raising crops or for pasturing cattle.

Smith v. Langevald, 1 New Eng. Rep. 449, 140 Mass. 205.

Action, in one form or another, by the owner of the dominant estate, to restrain the owner of the servient estate from destroying his right of way by placing gates and fences across it, depositing substances in it, building buildings upon it, cutting it up and rendering it impassable by drawing heavy loads over it and the like, are common in the books. But this and the case of Brill v. Brill, 11 Cent. Rep. 305, 106 N. Y. 511, are the only cases we have found where the owner of the right of way attempted by suit to increase the burden upon the fee.

The right acquired by the plaintiff by his proceeding to lay out a private way is the right of passage, that is, the right to use the surface of the soil for the purpose of passing and repassing, and the incidental right of properly fitting the surface for that use, and of keeping the same in repair, and the right to maintain an action for the redress of any injury to these rights. The defendant, as owner of the soil, has all rights and benefits of ownership consistent with such easement. Among others he has the right of possession, and the actual possession, and the right to have his land fenced or unfenced at his pleasure.

Mr. J. Willard Babbitt for defendant in error.

McGrath, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is trespass for tearing down a fence on the line of a private road. The cause was tried by the court, and comes here upon findings of fact and conclusions of law. Defendant owned a parcel of land lying between plaintiff's land and the public highway. Plaintiff in August, 1887, applied to the highway commissioner, under the statute, to lay out a private road twenty-four feet wide, at one side of defendant's premises, extending from the public highway to plaintiff's land, upon which application the necessary proceedings were had, and the road was laid out and opened, taking less than one third of an acre of land, for which the jury awarded, and plaintiff paid, $75. The defendant did not signify his intention of making use of said private road pursuant to section 1393, How. Stat. Since the opening of said highway in August, 1887, the plaintiff has been accustomed to use her said land as pasture; that during the seasons of pasture the plaintiff has daily driven her stock, cattle and horses over and along said private road; that the lot of the defendant lying adjacent to this private road on the south side thereof embraces some nine acres of land, and is arable soil, used by the defendant for crops and pasture; that, shortly after the opening of said private way, the defendant said to the plaintiff that he did not know as he, the defendant, wished for any fence on the south side of said right of way; that at some later period the defendant passing on the plaintiff's premises. An inclosed road might be a convenience, but its creation is not imposed upon the plaintiff by the terms of the grant; it is not an actual or direct necessity to the full enjoyment of the privilege reserved, and it cannot be implied as incident thereto. Brill v. Brill, 11 Cent. Rep. 305, 106 N. Y. 511.

The defendant certainly has no right to preclude the plaintiff from availing himself of the right of passage, or to render the exercise of that right unusually or unreasonably difficult or burthensome. Bakeman v. Talbot, 31 N. Y. 886.

Owner liable for injuries occasioned by defective fence.

One who erects and maintains a barb-wire fence, although entirely upon his land, the wires of which are not properly stretched, but are left hanging loose in such a way that stock are not likely to see them, and are liable to run upon them and be injured, is guilty of negligence in creating a liability for such injuries. Loveland v. Gardner, 4 L. R. A. 305, 79 Cal. 317.

A failure to keep a lawful fence around a growing crop which in its nature cannot be regarded as dangerous to stock cannot be regarded as such negligence as will render the owner of the ground liable for injury resulting to animals running at large, that entered and were injured by eating the crop. Fennell v. Seguin Street R. Co. 70 Tex. 870. 12 L. R. A.

Effects of the unlawful removal of fence.

Where a division fence has been unlawfully removed by the owner, leaving the crops of the adjoining owner exposed, the latter has the legal right to avert the danger by again connecting his fence with that of the former, and the latter is guilty of an offense, under Tex. Pen. Code, art. 684, if he pulls down the fence so erected to close the gap caused by his removal of the division fence. Jamison v. State, 37 Tex. App. 443.

The sole owner of a division fence cannot lawfully withdraw or separate it from the connecting fence of the adjoining owner without first giving notice in writing of his intention to do so, under Tex. Stat. 1897, p. 80, § 2, for at least six months prior to so doing. Jamison v. State, 37 Tex. App. 442.

It is the duty of a landowner to take notice of the natural propensity of domestic animals, and to exercise reasonable care to prevent his fence from becoming dangerous. The fact that the fence was constructed entirely upon defendant's land is no defense, if negligently constructed or maintained. Loveland v. Gardner, 4 L. R. A. 305, 79 Cal. 317.

"Under the statute of Indiana," both parties to a partition fence are equally bound to maintain it. Either may repair, and enforce contribution from the other; but failure to do so leaves them upon their respective common-law rights and obligations. Myers v. Dodd, 9 Ind. 390. And see Cook v. Morea, 33 Ind. 497.

instructed the plaintiff that she must lead her stock when they passed along this way; that thereafter, in the summer of 1888, the plaintiff erected a post and wire fence along the south side of said way, and about one foot within the limits of the same; that said fence was sufficient to turn the said stock of cattle and horses and keep them within the way while passing through the same; that in the month of May, 1889, the defendant entered upon said way, and tore down and removed the said fence as aforesaid erected by the plaintiff; and this action is brought to recover for the alleged trespass; that the damage to said fence was $2; that the defendant did not consent or object to the building of the fence by the plaintiff along the said right of way; that the wires composing the said fence so built by the said plaintiff along the said way were, to some extent, at one or two points, down and on the defendant's land; that there was no evidence that defendant, Crane, interfered with plaintiff's use of the said right of said road. The court found, as a conclusion of law from the above and foregoing facts, that the plaintiff had the right of way or private passage over the land of the defendant; that, as an incident thereto, she had the right to whatever may be necessary for the reasonable and proper enjoyment thereof; that it is unreasonable, while the defendant crops or pastures his land adjacent to said right of way, to forbid or prevent the plaintiff from employing the usual and reasonable methods of protecting herself from the hazards and danger attending the driving of stock along said way, with the fields of the defendant inviting and uninclosed; that to withhold such right of protection from the plaintiff, and at the same time to hold her responsible for all damage which her stock may unavoidably do to the property of the defendant, is practically to destroy the value of the right which the plaintiff has purchased, or, if there be no liability except for want of due care, yet with the growing grain lying adjacent thereto, unfenced, it would be impossible to enjoy to any reasonable extent this right of way. The right, therefore, of the plaintiff to erect and maintain a suitable fence adapted to the object sought, and within the right of way, must be deemed an incident necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the easement obtained, and the court finds, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, and assesses the damages of the plaintiff at the sum of $2, with costs of suit to be taxed.

The defendant insists that he is still the owner of the soil over which the easement exists; that as such he is entitled to the herbage growing thereon, and to use the land for raising crops, or for pasturage, subject only to plaintiff's right of way over it; and the defendant cannot be excluded from it by the construction of a fence on the line of the way. "Action in one form or another," says counsel for defendant, "by the owner of the dominant estate, to restrain the owner of the servient estate from destroying his right of way, by placing gates and fences across it, depositing substances in it, building buildings upon it, cutting it up, and rendering it impassable by drawing heavy loads over it, and the like, are common in books. But this, and the case of Brill v. Brill, 106 N. Y. 511, 11 Cent. Rep. 805, are the only cases we have found where the owner of the right of way attempted by suit to increase the burden upon the fee." While it is true, is it not because the right to an inclosed way is generally conceded? It cannot be denied that as a rule public highways, private rights of way, and ways or lanes maintained upon agricultural lands for the convenience of private owners, are in fact inclosed. This is not a case where the owner of the dominant estate seeks to compel the owner of the servient estate to maintain a fence, for here the owner of the dominant estate seeks only to establish her right to inclose the way to protect herself in its enjoyment. It is well known that private roads are invariably inclosed, and no case can be found in the books where the right to inclose a statutory private road has been assailed. In several of the adjudicated cases the existence of boundary-line fences appears. Whether inclosed by the owner of the fee or the owner of the way we are not advised, but the fact of inclosure remains. When a right of way exists by virtue of a license or grant, the incidents of that right are determined by reference to such grant or license, and when that is uncertain or ambiguous, the circumstances surrounding the grant or license and the situation of the parties must be inquired into with a view of arriving at the intention of the parties. When acquired by prescription, it is largely a question of the nature of the prior use. The right here insisted upon is not one acquired by grant, license, or prescription. It is one acquired and paid for under the Statute. It is not simply a right of way over defendant's land, nor a right of ingress or egress merely. It is a statutory private road, twenty-four feet in width, all or any part of which may be used by plaintiff for any and all purposes for which any highway may be used. It may be planked, paved, macadamized or graveled by plaintiff for its entire width. The Statute contemplates not only a record of the description and laying out, but an actual opening of the road, involving the taking down of cross-fences, excluding the presumption that the possession was to remain in the owner of the fee.

It appears from the adjudications: (1) That the conveyance of a right of way gives to the grantee not only a right to an unobstructed passage at all times over defendant's lands, but also such rights as are incident or necessary to the enjoyment of such right or passage. Maxwell v. McAtee, 9 B. Mon. 21; Bliss v. Greeley, 45 N. Y. 671; Herrman v. Roberts, 119 N. Y. 87, 7 L. R. A. 226. (2) The owner of the way, where its limits are defined, has not only the rights of a free passage over the traveled part, but also to a free passage on such portions of the way as he thinks proper or necessary. Herrman v. Roberts, supra. (3) The owner of the fee, subject to an easement, may rightfully use the land for any purpose not inconsistent with the rights of the owner of the easement. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Telford (Tenn.) 14 S. W. Rep. 778; Herrman v. Roberts, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 691. (4) The rights of the owner of the easement are paramount, to the extent of the grant, to those of the owner of the soil. Herrman v. Roberts, supra; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Telford, supra; Kansas Cent. R. Co. v. Allen, 22 Kan. 285. (5) The owner of the soil is under no obligation to repair the way, as that duty belongs to the party for whose benefit it is constructed. Herrman v. Roberts, supra. (6) What may be considered a proper and reasonable use by the owner of the fee, as distinguished from an unreasonable and improper use, as well as what may be necessary to plaintiff's beneficial use and enjoyment, are questions of fact to be determined by the trial court or jury. Bakeman v. Talbot, 81 N. Y. 366; Huson v. Young, 4 Lana. 64; Prentice v. Geiger, 74 N. Y. 842; Herrman v. Roberts and Kansas Cent. R. Co. v. Allen, supra.

In Herrman v. Roberts, supra, decided in 1880, the court says: "It cannot be assumed, in the absence of any provision looking thereto in the grant, that the grantor intended to reserve any use of the land which should limit or disturb the full and unrestricted enjoyment of the easement granted. The purpose contemplated by the grant was the creation of an easement for the plaintiff's use, and not the reservation to the owner of the use of his land. Every use by the owner was abandoned, except such as might be made in a mode entirely consistent with the full and undisturbed enjoyment by the grantees of the easement. The idea of a joint use of the land by both parties, in the sense that a use by the grantee should at any time give way to a use by the grantor, is contrary to the plain meaning and intent of the grant. The use of the land, says the court, for agricultural purposes, is clearly inconsistent with the rights acquired by plaintiff."

In Bakeman v. Talbot, supra, the lands of defendant, divided into several lots, lay between two parcels of land owned by plaintiff, one of which was a wood-lot. Defendant had constructed a fence on the lines of his several lots, but had provided a set of bars at each point crossed by the right of way. The right of way rested in a decree of partition, which gave to the plaintiff "the right of way to enable him to pass to and from his wood-lot, for the purpose of obtaining wood;" and it was held that nothing passed as an incident to such grant but what was requisite to its fair enjoyment; that the present arrangements were suitable and sufficient under existing circumstances; that, if the passage was made as convenient as the mode of access which a farmer usually provides for himself to get to and from his wood-land, it was sufficient; that after the circumstances have changed, and the question shall then arise as to what shall then be proper, it may be then determined that an open way may be necessary.

In Brill v. Brill, supra, defendant sold to plaintiff, and reserved the right of free ingress and egress across the premises conveyed, and plaintiff complained because defendant left the gates open, and defendant complained because plaintiff refused to maintain fences along the road. Although the court said that the owner of the soil has the right to have the way fenced or unfenced at his pleasure, yet the question there was whether plaintiff could be compelled to maintain a fence, and the court held that he was not obliged to maintain a fence; that an inclosed fence was not an actual or direct necessity to the full enjoyment of the privilege reserved. The court in that case found that the necessity for the fence did not exist. The right was one of ingress and egress merely, over an open way, which had been used before the land had been divided. No specific number of feet was set apart. Fences, under such circumstances, would increase the burden by actually taking the additional land necessary for a fence each side of the way. The right of way in that case was through the farm, separating it into two parcels, in which case fences would necessarily seriously inconvenience the owner of the fee. The court says: "The plaintiff's lands were thus made servient to the convenience and pleasure of the owner of the other parcel of land to the expressed extent, and no further. No case has been found which imposes a duty upon the owner of the lands so burdened to do any positive act, as, in this instance, erect or maintain a fence for the benefit of the owner of the dominant estate. The plaintiff was no more bound to define by fences the course they should take than he was to prepare the surface of the way for their safe travel." As we have already said, plaintiff does not seek to impose the duty of any positive act upon defendant. She seeks simply to be allowed, at her own expense, to make this way as convenient as the modes of passage which farmers usually provide for themselves upon their own premises. This is a road laid out and opened twenty-four feet wide. It is laid across one end of defendant's farm. Defendant owns no land beyond it. The fence is within the twenty-four feet. It is built, not for ornament, or to mark the line of the way merely, but for utility, because actually necessary. Applying the rules laid down by these adjudications, it seems clear to me that plaintiff is entitled to make use of this way for any and all purposes for which a road may be used; that defendant is under no obligation either to improve the bed of the way, or to protect its use; that plaintiff is entitled to do any act which may be necessary to promote its beneficial use, to the extent of inclosing the same; that the only limit to the servitude which she is entitled to impose upon the fee is what may be deemed necessary and essential to her enjoyment of the rights acquired; that the rights of defendant in this way are subject to plaintiff's necessities arising from the legitimate use of the road; that the necessity and reasonableness of the means made use of to adapt the road to her use are questions of fact, to be determined by the trial court; and that the findings of the trial court in that regard are conclusive upon us. The court below finds that the plaintiff has been accustomed daily to drive her cattle and horses through this private road, and that a fence along the same is an incident necessary to the reasonable enjoyment thereof.

The other Justices concurred.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Elijah C. FINNEY, Appt.

v.

George F. HARDING.

(.....):

A landlord's lien on crops for rent under Rev. Stat., chap. 80, can give him no right to maintain a personal action for damages against a bona fide purchaser from the tenant although he may follow the goods and distrain for his rent.

(Ortolg, J., dissentia.)

(March 30, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages from defendant for having purchased from plaintiff's tenant crops subject to a landlord's lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Eckhart & Moore for appellant.
Mr. William J. Ammen for appellee.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following statement of fact, taken from the opinion of the appellate court, will be sufficient to present the single point arising on this record: Appellee, a resident of Chicago, made a lease, in writing, to Matthias Klien, of a quarter-section of land in Douglas County, for one year from March 1, 1886, at a cash rent of $480, payable on or before the 1st day of January next following, and providing, among other things, that the crops should not be removed until the rent was paid. In August and December, 1886, appellant for his firm, which then was, and for some years had been, engaged in the business of buying and shipping grain at Tuscola, about three miles from the demised premises, purchased of the tenant oats and corn raised on said premises, of the value of $227.16, and paid him therefor in good faith, and without any notice that he was a tenant, or that the grain had been raised on demised premises, or that any rent was unpaid; about the 1st of January, 1887, Klien left the farm and the county wholly insolvent, and with $380 of the rent unpaid. Appellee brought this suit to the October Term, 1887, in assumpsit, on the common counts, and a special count setting out the facts, to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, which was tried by the court without a jury, under a stipulation that the form of action might be disregarded, and any legal claim or defense shown. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for $227.16.

The single point for decision is stated by the counsel for the appellant to be "whether a bona fide purchaser, without notice, of crops grown on rented premises, for a valuable consideration, is protected in law;" and, as stated by counsel for appellee, "Does the statutory lien of the landlord on the crops hold against the purchaser of the crop from the tenant, who purchases within the six months named by the

NOTE.—Express legislation on the subject of landlords' liens.

By express legislation, in several States, an attempt has been made to regulate the rights of a landlord to secure his unpaid rental by a statutory lien upon growing crops.

The language of this legislation has assumed a variant phraseology, but its substantial requirements have been found embodied in the Act of Congress, passed February 23, 1867, §§ 13, 14 (Stat. at L.) 404.

The Act referred to is in entire harmony with the various legislative provisions in the different States, and any judicial interpretation it may receive is peculiarly applicable as an exposition to any of the state enactments of similar import. Especially is this true of the Illinois Statute under construction in the principal case.

The conclusions of the authorities.

The courts of Iowa, Missouri, Alabama and Arkansas, interpreting the Statutes of those States (Iowa Code, §§ 1270, 1271; Mo. Rev. Stat. 618; Ark. Rev. Stat. 979, and Clay's Ala. Dig. 505), which are nearly similar in their provisions to the Act now under consideration, have adjudged as follows:

1. The landlord's lien attaches at the commencement of the tenancy, or where the goods are carried on the rental premises, and not from the time of the commencement of proceedings to enforce it. Grant v. Whitwell, 9 Iowa, 158; Powell v. Hadden, 21 Ala. 745; Sevier v. Shaw, 25 Ark. 417; Smith v. Meyer, 25 Ark. 608.

2. The landlord's lien is upon the stock in mass and not in detail, and when goods are sold in the usual course of trade carried on, in or upon the rental premises, they are sold discharged of the 12 L. R. A.

lien, and the lien continues on those remaining. Grant v. Whitwell, supra, re-affirmed in Carpenter v. Gillespie, 10 Iowa, 562, and again in Doane v. Garretson, 24 Iowa, 361.

3. This lien continues eight months, and during that time the landlord may take steps to subject the crop to the payment of the rent. If the property remains in specie in the hands of an assignee, he may, during the continuance of the lien, seize it under protest; or might, if it was consumed, hold the assignee accountable for its value, if the assignment was taken with a knowledge of the existence of the lien. Knox v. Hunt, 18 Mo. 243.

4. Statutory liens without possession have the same virtue that existed in common-law liens accompanied by possession. Grant v. Whitwell, supra.

At common law, a purchaser of goods and chattels takes them subject to the same lien which existed against the vendor. Man v. Shiffner, 2 East, 523; Godin v. London Assur. Co. 1 Burr. 489; Burton v. Smith, 28 U. S. 13 Pet. 464, 10 L. ed. 248.

In the case of Webb v. Sharp, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 15, 20 L. ed. 473, the court in part construed the Act of 1867, and adopted substantially the same rules of construction which guided the court of last resort of Iowa.

Repeated decisions in other jurisdictions have settled the question that the lien in such cases attaches at the commencement of the tenancy, or whenever personal chattels owned by the tenant and subject to execution for debt are brought on the rented premises. Grant v. Whitwell, 9 Iowa, 158; Carpenter v. Gillespie, 10 Iowa, 562; Doane v. Garretson, 24 Iowa, 361; Powell v. Hadden, 21 Ala. 745; Sevier v. Shaw, 25 Ark. 417; Smith v. Meyer, Id. 608.

Statute, but whose purchase, however, is in good faith, for value, without actual notice of the existence of the facts contemplated by the provisions of statute" creating the lien? By stipulation a jury was waived, and under the declaration and plea of general issue filed proof was admissible that would sustain the plaintiff's right of recovery in any form of action or maintain any defense available. Propositions of law were asked and refused, properly raising the question stated. The question is therefore broadly presented, whether a right of action is shown in the plaintiff, irrespective of the form of action. The plaintiff is not seeking in this action to enforce his lien upon the crops grown upon the demised premises, but to charge the defendant as purchaser thereof, in a personal action for their value. Appellant was engaged in the business of buying and selling grain at Tuscola, and in August and December, Klien, the tenant of appellee, sold to appellant oats and corn in the regular course of business, amounting to $227.16, which was paid for at the time. The suit was brought in October, 1887. It is conceded that the grain was purchased in the ordinary way, without notice by appellant of Klien's relation to appellee, or that the grain was raised upon rented premises, nor are there any facts and circumstances shown which, it is claimed, would put appellant upon inquiry, or which, if followed, would lead to the fact. The 81st section of the Landlord and Tenant Act (Rev. Stat. chap. 80) is as follows: "Every landlord shall have a lien upon the crops grown or growing upon the demised premises for the rent thereof, whether the same is payable wholly or in part in money, or specific article of property or products of the premises, or labor, and also for the faithful performance of the term of the lease. Such lien shall continue for the period of six months after the expiration of the term for which the premises were demised." Cases involving this section of the Statute, in various forms, have frequently been before the court, but in none of them has this question been determined. In Miles v. James, 86 Ill. 899, it was held that the lien of the landlord was paramount to that of an execution. In Thompson v. Mead, 67 Ill. 895, and Wetzel v. Mayers, 91 Ill. 497, it was held that the lien of the landlord was prior to that execution and attachment. Substantially the same question was presented in Prettyman v. Unland, 77 Ill. 206. In Watt v. Scofield, 76 Ill. 261, it was found that Watt, the purchaser from the tenant of Scofield, had full knowledge of the landlord's lien for rent, and was chargeable with notice that the rent was unpaid. The case, however, went off upon the ground that trover would not lie; and the action being trover, the judgment below was reversed. In Hunter v. Whitfield, 89 Ill. 229, the court expressly found that the purchaser was chargeable with notice of the landlord's lien, and expressly declined to determine the question as to whether an action would lie against a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice. In Prink v. Pratt, 26 Ill. App. 223, the question was simply whether trover would lie by the landlord against the purchaser of the crop. It therefore follows that the question may be regarded substantially as one of first impression in this court.

The appellate court of the second district, in Hous v. Clark, 28 Ill. App. 145, held that no action would lie by the landlord against a liens of this nature are upon the chattels in bulk or the stock in mass and not in detail, or rather the lien is displaced where the goods are sold in the usual course of trade carried on by the tenant, provided they are duly delivered and do not remain on the premises. Grant v. Whitwell, Carpenter v. Gillespie and Doane v. Garretson, supra.

Purchasers of goods and chattels take them at common law subject to the liens which existed against the vendor, and the same rule applies in a case arising under the Act of Congress in question, where the purchase is of the stock in mass, which is not removed from the premises, or with knowledge of the lien, and not in the usual course of trade. Man v. Shifner, 2 East, 523; Godin v. London Assur. Co. 1 Burr. 489; Burton v. Smith, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 483, 10 L. ed. 248.

Sales of the stock in mass which is not removed, or not made in the ordinary course of trade on the premises and with knowledge of the lien, are subject to that rule under this provision, and the landlord may have his remedy for the same "in whose hands they may be found." Personal chattels sold in the ordinary course of trade on the premises without knowledge of the lien are not subject to the lien, or, in other words, the lien in respect to such sales where the goods are removed from the premises is displaced and the purchaser takes a perfect title to the property discharged of the lien. "Goods sold in the ordinary course of trade," says the United States Supreme Court (Webb v. Sharp, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 15, 20 L. ed. 478), "undoubtedly become discharged from the lien, because if it were not so business could not be safely carried on; but the court held in the same case that the lien created by that Act of Congress commences with the tenancy and continues for three months after the rent is due, which cannot be true for any practical effect if it be admitted that the sale of the personal property in bulk when not removed from the premises and not in the usual course of trade prevents the landlord from levying on the chattels in whose hands they may be found." Unquestionably the lien, when it once attaches, continues to attach to the chattels into whose hands the chattels may come during the time allowed for instituting proceedings, unless the lien is displaced by the removal of the goods or by the sale of the chattels by the tenant in the ordinary course of mercantile transactions. Support to that view is found in the fact that the Act of Congress, in providing a personal remedy by action against the purchaser with notice of the lien, evidently intends to permit the landlord to reach the chattels in whose hands they may be found, if the chattels were not sold in the usual course of business. Knox v. Hunt, 18 Mo. 243.

It was not the intention of this Statute to impose additional burdens upon purchasers of personal property. It gives the power to the landlord to prevent a sale at any time by attaching the goods, and thus secure his rent. But when a bona fide sale of the chattels has been consummated the lien of the landlord is at an end as to the chattels sold. Webb v. Sharp, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 14, 20 L. ed. 478.

The Statute declares positively that the remedy shall be against a purchaser of such chattels with notice of the lien, and gives no remedy against the purchaser without notice. This necessarily leads to the construction that a bona fide sale, without notice, discharges the property from the operation of the lien. Webb v. Sharp, supra, which case must be regarded as decisive of the question.

bona fide purchaser of the crop from the tenant; while in the Appellate Court of the Third District in the present case it was held that the landlord may maintain an action for money had and received, if the purchaser has converted the crops into money, and, if not, case may be maintained. We are also referred to decisions of other States, arising under statutes more or less variant, presenting a contrariety of construction and opinion. Among these are Nesbitt v. Bartlett, 14 Iowa, 485; Westmoreland v. Wooten, 51 Miss. 825; Seafie v. Stovall, 87 Ala. 287; Fowler v. Bapley, 83 U. S. 15 Wall. 328, 21 L. ed. 35; Beall v. White, 94 U. S. 362, 24 L. ed. 178; Fraser v. Jackson, 46 Ga. 621; Thornton v. Carver, 80 Ga. 397; Hasley v. Haynes, 87 Mich. 585; Smith v. Shell Lake Lumber Co. 68 Wis. 89,—which, with more or less pertinency, sustain the view that the lien of the landlord does not follow the crops into the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice. On the other hand, the cases mainly relied upon are Kennard v. Harvey, 80 Ind. 87; Mathews v. Burke, 83 Tex. 419; Davis v. Wilson, 86 Tenn. 519; Richardson v. Petersen, 58 Iowa, 724; Holden v. Cox, 60 Iowa, 449, and perhaps others,—the holding in which, more or less directly, is that the lien of the landlord is paramount as against a bona fide purchaser.

It must be observed, however, that in many of the latter cases it was sought to enforce the lien as against the property in the hands of a purchaser, and not to charge the purchaser for its conversion. Such was the case in Mathews v. Burke, Richardson v. Petersen, supra, and others. While in others, as in Holden v. Cox, it does not appear that the purchaser purchased without notice of the landlord's lien. A review of these authorities will be unnecessary, but an examination will disclose but few cases where the precise question at issue here was involved. It may be conceded that the lien given by the Statute would enable the landlord, by the issue of his warrant, to follow the property, and to seize it wherever found, as long as it could be identified, as a sheriff or other officer having an execution may follow property subject to the lien of his execution, and the pivotal question in this case would remain undetermined. It seems to be well settled that a purchaser from a judgment debtor of personal property subject to the lien of an execution, if made for value, will not be liable in an action by the plaintiff in execution for the value of the property. It is said in Kerr, Fraud and Mistakes, 201: "Though there be a judgment against the vendor, and the purchaser has notice of it, that fact will not, of itself, affect the validity of the sale of personal property." And so in Powers v. Wheeler, 63 Ill. 29, where it was sought by a plaintiff in execution to charge the purchaser of personal property with the value thereof, it was alleged in the second count of the declaration that, at the time the execution came into the hands of the officer, the defendant therein was the owner thereof, and had in his possession certain property, i. e., 800 hogs, which were liable to execution and subject to the lien thereof, and that the defendant purchased the same after they became so subject to said lien, etc.; and it was said by this court that the want of allegation of the knowledge of the judgment and execution, and of a fraudulent purpose on the part of the defendant to defeat the execution on the part of the purchaser at the time of purchasing the hogs, clearly rendered this count insufficient, and that a demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

Without further citation of authority to sustain this view, it is manifest from the authorities that the principle upon which a purchaser for value may be charged rests solely upon the ground of fraud. It was said by Lord Mansfield in Cadogan v. Kennet, Cowp. 432, quoted in Powers v. Wheeler, supra: "If a man knows of the judgment and execution, and, with a view to beat it, purchases the debtor's goods, it is void, because the purpose is iniquitous," and continuing the quotation from Kerr, supra, it is said: "But if the purchaser, knowing of the judgment, purchases with the view and purpose to defeat the creditors' execution, it is iniquitous and fraudulent, notwithstanding he may have given a full price, for it is assisting the debtor to injure the creditor." And it was held in the Powers Case that the first count of the declaration, which alleged knowledge of the judgment and execution, and that the purchase was made with the purpose of aiding the defendant in execution in defrauding the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, was sufficient to charge the defendant, and that the demurrer thereto was improperly sustained. Further illustration of the distinction we are seeking to make might be given, but not without unduly extending this opinion. Much light, it seems to us, however, may be cast upon this lien by a consideration of the relation of the landlord to the property in respect of which the lien attaches. Thus it has been held, in Watt v. Scofield and Frink v. Pratt, supra, that trover will not lie by the landlord against one who has converted the crop, for the reason that the landlord is not, by virtue of his lien, either the owner or entitled to possession thereof. No better statement, perhaps, can be found in our Reports than that made in the separate opinion of Justices McAllister and Craig, in Watt v. Scofield. It is there said: "It is true, the plaintiff had a lien given by the Statute, but it is a mere lien. The landlord had not, by virtue of the lien alone and without levy of a distress warrant, a right of possession. He could not take possession of the tenant's crops at any time he chose, before the rent was due, nor could he after it was due, by virtue of the lien alone. The Statute gives no such authority. The remedy is therefore by action on the case for a fraudulent act, intended to impair the landlord's security, when the circumstances warrant, like the cases of a lien by mortgage or execution,"—citing Powers v. Wheeler, supra. It is true, as said in Thompson v. Mead, supra, that the lien of the landlord does not depend upon a levy of a distress warrant; but it has been uniformly held that until such levy the landlord had no right of possession or right of property in the crop. In many of the cases, as in the two already cited, the lien is likened to the lien of an execution, which gives to the officer no right in the property itself, nor will it enable him to maintain replevin, trover or trespass prior to the levy of his writ; and this is the current of the authority everywhere.

It should be observed that the decision in the case of Holden v. Cox, supra, is predicated upon the assumption "that whoever consumes or destroys personal property upon which another has a lien becomes liable to the lienholder in damages." Which, without qualification, is, as we have seen, unwarranted in respect of many liens. We are unable to distinguish the lien of the landlord, under this Statute, from that of any other "mere lien" created or given by statute, as that given to execution liens, or the lien given by the Statute of Michigan upon logs cut to the persons employed in cutting them, as shown in Hatley v. Haynes, 87 Mich. 585, and by the like Statute in Wisconsin, construed in Smith v. Shell Lake Lumber Co., 68 Wis. 89, and like cases.

The argument ab inconvenienti is pressed with force, not only in argument, but in several of the cases touching upon the character of the lien given. On the one side, it is urged that the Statute was intended to give real security to the landlord, and that the effect of so construing the Statute, as that the landlord shall not have the right of action against a bona fide purchaser, will render the lien valueless; and it cannot, therefore, be presumed that the Legislature intended to subordinate the lien to the right of an innocent purchaser. The force of this argument is much weakened by the consideration: first, that the landlord may pursue the property and seize it under his distress warrant, notwithstanding its alienation; and, second, that the landlord may, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, protect himself against the threatened loss. By an Act of the Legislature of this State, in force July 1, 1877, which, being in pari materia with the section already quoted, must be considered therewith, provides "that if any tenant shall, without the consent of his landlord, sell and remove, or permit to be removed, or be about to sell and remove, or to permit to be removed, from the demised premises, such part or portion of the crops raised thereon, or shall endanger the lien of the landlord upon such crops, for the rent agreed to be paid, it shall or may be lawful for the landlord to institute proceedings by distress before the rent is due," etc. It would seem to have been within legislative contemplation that the tenant had the right to sell the crops, reserving enough to satisfy his landlord's rent. But, be this as it may, it is apparent that the landlord has the ready means of protecting his lien, and securing himself against loss by the sale and removal of the crop, by the exercise of ordinary diligence and oversight. It must be admitted, on the other hand, that the purchaser of the crop, after its severance, and at a distance from the demised premises, is without such means of protection. It is a familiar principle that bona fide purchasers are favorites of the law, and the policy has ever been to protect them. The rule in respect of the construction of statutes was stated at an early day to be, "Acts of Parliament are to be so constructed as that no man who is innocent or free from injury or wrong be punished or endangered." 1 Co. Litt. 31. And the rule has been that a statute will not be so construed as to be violative of this fundamental principle, unless the language employed admitted of no other reasonable construction. But this Statute requires no construction. It is plain and unambiguous. It creates a lien upon the crops grown or growing for the rent of the demised premises, which no one denies. The only question is as to the effect which shall be given to the lien thus created. We are asked to extend by construction the force and effect of this lien beyond that of any other mere lien known to the law. In respect of chattel mortgages, there is constructive notice by its record. The lien created in favor of mechanics and materialmen is upon immovable property, in respect of which the purchaser can readily discern any recent improvements or changes; and yet the lienor, by express statute, to protect himself against subsequent purchasers or incumbancers, is required to file notice of his lien in a public office. The lien of an execution is at least based on the fact that there is a judgment rendered, by some court of competent jurisdiction, where the record thereof remains. The Legislature has in every such case taken precaution that notice should be given for the protection of bona fide purchasers; but, in respect of the lien created in favor of landlords, no provision is made, but it is left to be governed by the same rules applicable to the liens of executions and the like liens.

As we have seen, actual knowledge that the execution is a lien upon property, and that the purchaser has interfered with the same, with a fraudulent intent and purpose, is necessary to the maintenance of an action against said purchaser for damages. It was said in Grant v. Whitwell, 9 Iowa, 158, that statutory liens have all the force and effect of common-law liens accompanied by possession, and some other of the cases seem to have followed in holding the same doctrine upon the authority of that case. It is apparent from what has preceded that, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, such is not the rule in this State, or in respect of the lien being considered. A lienor, at common law, in possession, could maintain a trespass against a wrong-doer, or trover against one who should convert the goods, by virtue of his special property therein. It is unnecessary to pursue the want of analogy further, for the possession of the lienor would be notice to the world of his rights, whatever they might be. Here it is manifest, there being no actual possession by the landlord, and no record of which the public are required to or can take notice, the lien, although not a secret lien within the meaning of that term as used in judicial writings, and which is created by contract or act of the parties, is nevertheless secret, in the sense that it is unknown by any public record, or by the indicia of possession, and rests in the breasts of the landlord and tenant. An examination of the Iowa cases relied upon will show that an exception was created to the lien, and it was made subject to the course of business of the tenant, "so as not to interfere with sales of property contemplated by the character of the business prosecuted by the tenant, to which the landlord is presumed to have assented upon the leasing of the premises. Thus, a retail dealer may sell goods in the ordinary course of business, free from the landlord's lien, and the tenant of a farm may sell marketing, produce and live stock, which are usually kept for sale by farmers. In such cases the landlord's lien does not follow the property." Richardson v. Petersen, supra. It is to be remembered that that court is speaking only of the right to follow the specific property. Can it be said that where the landlord contracts for the payment of his rent the 1st day of January subsequent to the raising of the crops, and demises the premises to be planted in a crop which will mature and must be marketed months prior to that time, that it was within the contemplation of the parties that the lien should attach to such crops? It is a matter of common knowledge that in many parts of the State, in the vicinity of canning establishments, crops are raised in large quantities, which must be harvested and disposed of during the summer months. If A rents of B a tract of land to be put into tomatoes, sweet-corn and the like products, with a contract to pay rent the 1st of January, when the crops must be marketed and sold not later than August, and the rule contended for is to prevail, A must consent to the payment of his rent months in advance of the time it is due under the contract, or lose his crops; or, if the tenant sells such crops to an innocent purchaser without notice, for their full value, although perishable, the purchaser will be called upon to respond to the landlord, who, with complete power to protect himself, has stood by and permitted the sale. In this case it was admitted that the tenant was insolvent. A portion of the demised premises were put in oats, which must have been harvested in July, and ready for market and in fact sold in August. The expense of the tenant's living and of the raising of the crop must be paid, yet he may not sell a bushel of these oats, although the rent was not due until January, and though ample of the crop was then retained to more than satisfy the landlord's lien, without rendering the purchaser, who bought in good faith and for full value, liable to the landlord for the amount purchased. To extend by judicial construction the effect of the lien created by this Statute, to this extent would be unjust and inequitable. It follows from what has been said, the landlord having no right of property in the crop sold to appellant, and, as said in Watt v. Scofield, supra, no right to its possession, no action could be maintained by the landlord, except an action on the case for fraudulent acts intended to impair the landlord's security. The gist of the right of recovery in this action is the wrongful or tortious act of the defendant, or the omission of some legal duty, in consequence of which injury has resulted to the plaintiff. Here there was no fraudulent act, no knowledge of the lien of the landlord, or any intention to deprive him of his security, or to do any wrongful act; but defendant was a purchaser in good faith and for value from the tenant, who is not only the owner of the property, but clothed with the indicia of ownership. The suggestions by the appellate court that assumpsit for money had and received, if the defendant has reduced the property to money, would lie against him is equally untenable. Ordinarily this action will lie when one person has received money which in good conscience belongs to another, and where there is color or pretense of a contract relation existing, and will also lie in some cases where the money has been received or taken tortiously. There is here no contract relation, express or implied, and no tortious taking or receiving. Moreover, the rule as stated by Mr. Chitty is: "In order to maintain money had and received, either the money, or the goods for which the plaintiff claims the proceeds, must originally, or at the time of action brought, have belonged to the plaintiff." 1 Chitty, Pl. 858. And such has been the holding. Here, as we have seen, the landlord was not the owner of the property, or, by virtue of his lien only, entitled to its possession. Appellant was an innocent purchaser, without any notice of right or lien of appellee thereon; and while, as we have seen, the appellee, by virtue of his lien, may follow the property into the possession of the appellant, and distrain for his rent, he cannot maintain a personal action for damages.

The judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts are reversed, and the cause remanded for proceeding not inconsistent with this opinion.

Craig, J., dissenting:

I do not concur with the majority of the court in the decision of this case. In my judgment, the law is correctly declared by the Appellate Court in 82 Ill. App. 98.

v.

CITY OF CHICAGO.

(...Ill....)

1. An offer to sell property at a certain price may be proved against the owner as an admission of its value at or near the time of the offer.

NOTE.—Evidence is admissible to show an offer to sell at a certain time and price.

The decision as to the competency of the evidence introduced as formulated in the case under review was upon both principle and authority entirely competent. The decisions cited in the prevailing opinion have sustained the most critical scrutiny; but it should be borne in mind that declarations by the owner of real estate as to its value, to be competent as evidence, should be so recent in point of time as to be presumptively applicable at the time of the taking. Central Branch U. Pac. R. Co. v. Andrews, 37 Kan. 162; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 439; Mills, Em. Dom. § 172.

The case of Ottawa. O. & C. G. R. Co. v. Adolph, 41 Kan. 600, decided by the Supreme Court, of Kansas in 1899, and cited in the principal case is of direct adjudication in the point. Commissioner Holt, reading for reversal, after stating that the testimony of a co-defendant as to the value of certain premises had been evidenced by an offer to receive a certain sum in lieu of damages incident upon the construction of a railway over his land, says, in reference to this offer: It was in the nature of an admission of a party to the action, who, although not the owner of the land, yet as the husband of the owner, had a homestead interest therein.

2. The whole improvement must be taken into consideration in determining whether property is damaged by a public improvement, such as the change of grade of a street.
3. No damages can be recovered on account of a public improvement where no property is actually taken, if its fair market value is as much immediately after as before the improvement.
4. Courts have power to permit a view by the jury of premises, the damage to which is the subject of controversy in a civil action.
5. A statute making it obligatory on a court to permit a jury in eminent domain proceedings to view the premises on application of either party does not preclude the common-law right of a court in other cases to permit a view in its discretion.

(January 22, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted to plaintiff's property by reason of a change by defendant in the grade of a street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The court erred in permitting the jury to inspect the premises.

Doud v. Guthrie, 18 Ill. App. 656.

The court improperly permitted the option given by Mr. Springer to Mr. Hurlbut to be given in evidence. The evidence clearly shows that this sale was a forced sale and that the option was two or three times the real market value of the property.

Admissions of a party to the record.

In the principal case now under review the admissions affected a party to the record, and were made by one who was privy in law, who had an inchoate interest in the realty to be affected by the admission. Under such circumstances it is a familiar application of the Law of Evidence to attach great weight to such evidence, and a formidable array of authority sustains the admissibility of such proof. McNight v. McNight, 20 Wis. 446; Smith v. Maine, 25 Barb. 32; Tilton v. Emery, 17 N. H. 536; Emerson v. Thompson, 16 Mass. 429; Spaulding v. Hallenbeck, 35 N. Y. 204; Mueller v. Rebham, 94 Ill. 142. See Gibney v. Marchay, 34 N. Y. 301.

Another rule of extended application allows admission to affect a party to the record, if made by a person jointly interested with said party, and there are no indicia of fraud. Bank of United States v. Lyman, 20 Vt. 606; Dickinson v. Clark, 5 W. Va. 280; Barriok v. Austin, 21 Barb. 341; Camp v. Dill, 27 Ala. 558; Tyler v. Ulmer, 12 Mass. 163; Milton v. Hunter, 18 Bush, 163; Bigelow v. Foss, 59 Me. 162.

Generally it may be observed the declarations of a party to the record or of one identified in interest with him, are, as against such party, admissible in evidence. If they proceed from a stranger and cannot be brought home to the party, they are admissible, unless upon some of the other grounds 13 L. R. A.

already considered. Haines, Treatise, 12th ed. 1887, 657.

The rule of law with respect to self-regarding evidence is that when in the self-serving form it is not in general receivable; but that in the self-harming form it is, with few exceptions, receivable, and is usually considered proof of a very satisfactory kind. Gilbert, Ev. 4th ed. 112.

On the subject of admissions, it may be laid down as a first principle that the whole of the statement containing the admission is to be received together. This is necessary in order to enable the court and jury to judge of the true extent of the admission which, when taken entire, will often have a different import from that which a partial account might convey. Thompson v. Austin, 2 Dowl. & R. 368; Trammell v. Bassett, 24 Ark. 499; Barnes v. Allen, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 111; Searies v. Thompson, 18 Minn. 316; People v. Murphy, 39 Cal. 52; Barry v. Davis, 38 Mich. 515.

This entire subject received very careful consideration from the New York Court of Appeals in the case of Rouse v. Whited, 25 N. Y. 170.

Federal courts vindicate the decisions of the state tribunals in relation to this topic of admission, and in a very recent case it has been decided by the supreme bench that every admission of a party given in evidence is to be taken as an entirety of the fact which makes for the one side with the qualifications which limit, modify or destroy its effect on the other side. Mutual Benefit L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 39 U. S. 22 Wall. 32, 22 L. ed. 798.

On petition for rehearing.

The Constitution of 1870 provides: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

Art. 2, § 18.

Under the Act of 1845, Rev. Stat. 1845, chap. 92, p. 447, the court held that the Legislature never contemplated the payment of damages to the owner of a tract of land when the additional value to be given to the land by the improvement was fully equal to the injury which it would occasion.

Alton & S. R. Co. v. Carpenter, 14 Ill. 190.

The Legislature, seeing the injustice of this law, passed the Act of 1852 (Laws 1852, p. 146), since which the policy of the State has been that common or general benefits shall not be offset against the damages.

Curry v. Mt. Sterling, 15 Ill. 321; Hayes v. Ottumwa, O. & F. R. V. R. Co. 54 Ill. 878; Peoria, P. & J. R. Co. v. Black, 58 Ill. 33; Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Darst, 61 Ill. 331; Peoria, P. & J. R. Co. v. Laurie, 68 Ill. 264.

Under the Eminent Domain Law of 1872, the court has uniformly announced that general benefits could not be set off against the damages to the remaining portion of the property not taken by the proceeding under that Act.

The cases permitting the jury in arriving at their verdict to ascertain the value before and after the construction of the improvement have no application to the case at bar, where the question of benefits is involved, since such question was not involved in them.

The passage of the Eminent Domain Law of 1872 is an expression of the will of the Legislature, that in no case for an injury to property arising from the taking or damaging of the same for public improvement, general benefits shall not be set off.

necessity of another; nor, on the other hand, is it to be limited to that price which the property would bring when forced off at auction under the hammer. It is what it would bring at a fair public sale when one party wanted to sell and the other to buy. Pittsburgh, V. & C. R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. 325. See also Little Rock Junction R. Co. v. Woodruff, 49 Ark. 381; Lawrence v. Boston, 119 Mass. 123.

In estimating the value of property taken for public use, it is the market value of the property which is to be considered, — that is the market value as defined in the preceding paragraph. Everett v. Union Pac. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 243; Central Branch U. P. R. Co. v. Andrews, 26 Kan. 702; Burt v. Wigglesworth, 117 Mass. 302; Mississippi River Bridge Co. v. Ring, 58 Mo. 491; Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Elliott, 5 Nev. 368; Shenango & A. R. Co. v. Braham, 73 Pa. 447; Cummings v. Williamsport, 84 Pa. 472; Woodfolk v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 2 Swan, 422; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 478.

Market value of property under judicial interpretation is construed to mean its value for any use to which it may be put; and if its natural or acquired advantages of situation, surroundings, or character are particularly adapted to some special use, all these circumstances are deemed to give intrinsic value to it, and should be taken into consideration in estimating its value. Mississippi & Rum River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 408, 25 L. ed. 306.

An express line of adjudication sustained with substantial unanimity the propositions of the text, that the fair market value is to control the question of compensation, and that value must be estimated from the knowledge of the most advantageous uses to which the property might be applied. Brisbane v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 114; Goodin v. Cincinnati & W. W. Canal Co. 18 Ohio 12 L. R. A.

St. 169; Re New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Hun, 149; Shenango & A. R. Co. v. Braham, 73 Pa. 447; Harrison v. Young, 9 Ga. 369; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30; Robb v. Maysville & Mt. S. Turnp. Co. 3 Met. (Ky.) 117; Henderson & N. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 17 B. Mon. 178; Trustees of College Point v. Dennett, 5 Thomp. & C. 217.

The views we have expressed as to the justness of considering the peculiar fitness of the lands for particular purposes as an element in estimating their value find support in the several cases cited by counsel. Thus, in Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 669, where a lot upon which the owner had his residence was injured by cutting down an embankment in opening a street in the City of Brooklyn, the Supreme Court of New York said that neither the purpose to which the property was applied, nor the intention of the owner in relation to its future enjoyment, was a matter of much importance in determining the compensation to be made to him; but that the proper inquiry is, "What is the value of the property for the most advantageous uses to which it may be applied?"

In Goodin v. Cincinnati & W. W. Canal Co., 18 Ohio St. 169, where a railroad company sought to appropriate the bed of a canal for its track, the Supreme Court of Ohio held that the rule of valuation was what the interest of the canal company was worth, not for canal purposes or for any other particular use, but generally for any and all uses for which it might be suitable. Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30.

Viewing premises by the jury.

In case of trials before common-law juries, statutes usually provide for a view of the premises, either as matter of right or in the discretion of the court. If the Statute is silent as to the stage of the trial at which the view shall be made, it rests in

An offer by the owner of property to sell it at a certain price, or an actual sale by him, is competent evidence against him as an admission in determining its value at or about the time of the offer or sale.

The right to send the jury out to have a view, although it may have had a common-law origin, is regarded now as statutory, and it is not now the practice to grant a view, except pursuant to an express statute or by consent. Abbott, Trial Brief, p. 72.

It is declared by the Act of Congress of June, 1872 (17 Stat. at L. 197, § 5), "that the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding, in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform as near as may be" to the same things "existing at the time in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit and district courts are held."

A logical corollary of this enactment enforces the conclusion that the mode of proceeding in cases where view of the premises is desired is regulated 12 L. R. A.

Lehigh Valley O. Co. v. Chicago, 26 Fed. Rep. 415.

In suits like the present one, it is proper to instruct the jury that the right of recovery depends on whether the abutter's property has been depreciated in value by the public improvement.

exclusively by the practice methods in vogue in the various state jurisdictions.

Legislation in the code States on the subject.

In most of the so-called code States, legislative enactment has established adequate provision for meeting this class of cases, and the recital is to be found in the various codes which are designed to regulate the subject. Without attempting to discriminate among the variety of efficient enactments, section 610 of the California Code of Civil Procedure may be deemed typical of all the legislation upon this subject. The section in question employs the following language: "When, in the opinion of the court, it is proper for the jury to have a view of the property which is the subject of litigation, or of the place in which any material fact occurred, it may order them to be conducted, in a body, under the charge of an officer, to the place, which shall be shown to them by some person appointed by the court for that purpose. While the jury are thus absent, no person, other than the person so appointed, shall speak to them on any subject connected with the trial."

Under judicial interpretation this section does not convert the jury into silent witnesses, as they are required to decide on the evidence, not upon their view. The only object of the view is to enable them to understand the evidence. Wright v. Carpenter, 49 Cal. 608.

The exercise of the authority to direct the jury to view the premises rests in the judgment and discretion of the court, and the refusal to exercise it will not constitute reversible error where it is not made to appear that the decision was not correct or that the discretion of the court in the matter was abused. King v. Iowa Midland R. Co. 34 Iowa, 458; Clayton v. Chicago, I. & D. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 228.

Both of the cases last cited were expository of section 3997 of the Iowa Code, which regulates the subject for that jurisdiction. The New York Code of Civil Procedure gives statutory effect to similar regulations to section 1563.

It being clear that we were at liberty to show by oral testimony the condition of the property at the time of the trial, there must be strong reasons shown, before this court will hold that the trial judge could not permit the jury to themselves see the premises.

See 1 Best, Ev. Morgan's ed. § 197; Bentham, Rationale of Jud. Ev. Book V. chap. 8, § 1; 1 Taylor, Ev. 8th ed. § 554; 1 Wharton, Ev. 3d ed. § 845.

This court has held, in a personal injury case, that it is discretionary with the trial court to admit in evidence the torn clothing worn by the plaintiff at the time of the accident.

No inference can be drawn from the Eminent Domain Act that the Legislature either supposed that the discretionary right to grant a view did not exist before the Statute, or that, if they thought it did so exist, they intended by the Statute to take it away.

Confusion has been introduced into this subject by confounding the view by jury with the technical writ of view at common law.

At common law, in a real action, the tenant might be ignorant as to what the land was which was claimed by the demandant. In such a case the tenant had a right to a writ of view, so that he might see the land and learn what was demanded.

Law, Finlason's ed. 420-422; *Astmal v. But, in real actions, where the tenant actually knew, or for any reason was held bound to know, what premises were claimed, he could not have a view.

Booth, Real Actions, p. 37; Roscoe, Real Actions, 247; Astmal v. Astmal, supra.

This subject of writs of view by a jury at common law is involved in the greatest confusion as to the cases in which it was allowed, but it is certain that they were not confined, as was the tenant's view, to real actions.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover damages alleged to have been caused to the property of appellant by the construction of Jackson Street Bridge and viaduct, and the approach on Canal Street, by the City of Chicago. On a trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant, the City of Chicago. The court overruled a motion for a new trial, and rendered judgment on the verdict. On appeal to the appellate court the judgment was affirmed.

The improvement was completed by the City in July or August, 1888. During the month the improvement was completed Horace A.

Hurlbut commenced negotiations with the plaintiff for the purchase of a portion of the property claimed to have been damaged. The negotiations resulted in an option given by the plaintiff to Hurlbut for the property for a certain time at a stipulated price. Hurlbut did not, however, close the contract within the time specified in the offer, and plaintiff advanced the price of the property, and subsequently, within three or four months, sold to Hurlbut at the advanced price. On the trial the court permitted the defendant to prove the price placed on the property by the plaintiff in his offer to Hurlbut, and this decision is relied upon as error. In order to determine whether the plaintiff had been damaged by the construction of the improvement, it was proper to show the value of the property before and after the improvement had been made. Evidence of what the property was worth in July and August, 1888, was therefore competent for the consideration of the jury. This is not, however, disputed or denied, but it is claimed that the offer of plaintiff is not evidence of the value of the property. While we do not think the offer of an owner of property to sell at a certain price would be conclusive evidence of the value of the property, yet we do think that an offer by the owner to sell is competent evidence against him as an admission in fixing the value at or near the time the offer was made. Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 439, 446; Mills, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 172; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 619, 620; East Brandywine & W. R. Co. v. Ranck, 78 Pa. 454; Concord R. Co. v. Greely, 28 N. H. 287; Ottawa, O. C. & O. G. R. Co. v. Adolph, 41 Kan. 600; Springfield v. Schmook, 68 Mo. 394; Watson v. Milwaukee & W. R. Co. 57 Wis. 382; Fogg v. Hill, 21 Me. 529.

In Lewis on Eminent Domain, 439, the author says: "In regard to the proof of admission of the parties the same general rules apply as in other cases. It is competent to prove the declarations of the owner of the property in question as to its value, and the price at which he has offered to sell it, and other admissions which are pertinent to the issue." See also § 446.

In 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 620, the law on the question is stated as follows: "The declarations of the owner as to the value of his land, and his offer of it at a fixed price, may competently be introduced in evidence against him, and, if the landowner dies while the proceedings are pending, his declarations and admissions are competent evidence against his trustees."

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in considering the question in Watson v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., 57 Wis. 382, said: "This evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing that the land was in fact of greater value after the road was located across it than the value placed upon it by the appellant's witnesses. We think the evidence was competent, not only as tending to prove its real value after the railroad was located across it, but as an admission on the part of the appellants of such value. Whitman v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Allen, 318-318; Shattuck v. Stoneham B. R. 6 Allen, 117."

In East Brandywine & W. R. Co. v. Ranck, 78 Pa. 454, the court said: "As evidence bearing on the value of this property, Ranck's own declarations were certainly competent, when offered by the company. His offer of it at a fixed price, and the sale of a portion of it, were facts proper to go the jury as constituting his estimate of its value. It is true the sale of a portion of the property does not fix with certainty its market value as a whole, but it is an element fair to be considered by the jury."

In 1 Rorer on Railroads, 379, and in Pierce on Railroads, 225, the doctrine is laid down that the admissions of the owner are competent evidence on the question of value. It is, however, said the sale to Yerkes was a forced sale; that Springer, knowing that Yerkes was bound to have the property for a particular purpose, placed a larger price on the property than it was really worth. Whether Yerkes was so situated that he was compelled to purchase this property, and on that account might pay more for it than it was really worth, was a question which no doubt might be considered by the jury in arriving at its value; but at the same time such fact, if it existed, affords no reason why the jury might not also consider the statements and declarations of the plaintiff in connection with the other evidence in arriving at the value of the property. The option placed on the property by the plaintiff, as an admission of the value of the property, was competent evidence for the jury. Whether it proved the value was a question for the jury to determine after a due consideration of all the evidence introduced on the question.

It is next claimed that the court erred in modifying plaintiff's first and third instructions. In the first instruction the jury were directed that if they find from the evidence the defendant had raised the grade of the street in front of plaintiff's property, and thereby damaged the property, they will find defendant guilty and assess damages at such sum as they believe from the evidence he sustained, resulting directly from changing the grade in front of said property, taken in connection with the whole improvement. The court added the following: "In case you believe from the evidence that plaintiff's property was damaged by said improvement taken as a whole." The modification was so slight that it did not materially change the meaning of the instruction, but, if it did, the modification was right, and could not mislead the jury. The plaintiff claimed that he was damaged by the improvement, and in passing upon the question it was the duty of the jury to take into consideration the whole improvement. A part of the improvement standing alone may have resulted in damage to plaintiff, but, when the entire improvement is taken into consideration, a benefit, rather than a loss, may have been the result; hence the necessity of the attention of the jury being directed to the whole improvement. What has been said in reference to the first modification will apply to the others.

Complaint is also made of appellee's instructions that they directed the jury that "if, by the improvement as a whole, the property is benefited as much as it is damaged by the construction of the approach alone, then there can be no recovery." The last part of plaintiff's first instruction, prepared by him and given to the jury on the question of the measure of damages, is as follows: "The measure of damages to the property will be the difference, as shown by the evidence, between the fair cash market value of the plaintiff's property without said improvement and change of grade and the fair cash market value of said property with said improvement, taken as a whole, and change of grade completed." This was given as asked by plaintiff, except the words "taken as a whole," were added by the court, and it contains the same principle introduced in defendant's instructions, which plaintiff now undertakes to condemn. A party cannot complain of an instruction given in behalf of his adversary like one given at his own request. But, aside from this, we perceive no objection to defendant's instructions. Where an action is brought to recover damages, where no part of the plaintiff's property has been taken but merely damaged by a public improvement, the law is well settled that a recovery cannot be had unless the property claimed to be damaged has been depreciated in value by the construction of the public improvement. In other words, if the fair market value of the property is as much immediately after the construction of the improvement as it was before the improvement was made, no damage has been sustained and no recovery can be had. Elgin v. Eaton, 88 Ill. 535; Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Francis, 70 Ill. 238; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hall, 90 Ill. 42; St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Haller, 83 Ill. 206; St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Capps, 67 Ill. 607, 614; Eberhart v. Chicago & St. P. R. Co. 70 Ill. 347; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 812; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Loeb, 118 Ill. 203, 5 West. Rep. 887; Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Stein, 75 Ill. 41, 47; Page v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Ill. 324.

After the jury was impaneled, and before the trial commenced, the court, on motion of defendant, permitted the jury, in charge of an officer, to go upon and view the premises in controversy, and this ruling is relied upon as error. It is not claimed that in the conduct of the men there was any misbehavior on the part of the officer in charge, or on behalf of any of the jury, or on behalf of either representative of the respective parties who accompanied the jury. The naked claim is a want of power on the part of the court to permit the view. The viaduct was completed in August, 1888, and the trial occurred, and the view was had, in December, 1889. Evidence of the condition of the property at the time of the trial was competent, and the parties had the right to show the value of the property at the time of the trial, as such evidence would have a bearing on the value of the property before and after the alleged damage. The rule seems to be well established that evidence of the value of the property before and after the time when the damages are alleged to have been sustained is admissible, and the time within which such evidence shall be enforced is a matter in the sound discretion of the trial court. Roberts v. Boston, 149 Mass. 347. If the parties had the right to prove by oral testimony the condition of the property at the time of the trial (and upon this point we think there can be no doubt), upon what principle can it be said the court could not allow the jury in person to view the premises and thus ascertain the condition thereof for themselves? The premises in view may be regarded, as it is termed in the books, "real evidence," and oral testimony in reference to the premises could not be as satisfactory in its character as the real evidence. In 1 Best, Ev. Morgan's ed. § 197, it is said: "Real evidence is either immediate or reported. Immediate real evidence is where the thing which is the source of evidence is present to the senses of the tribunal." In section 198 it is said: "Reported real evidence is where the thing which is the source of the evidence is not present to the senses of the tribunal, but the existence of it is conveyed to them through the medium of witnesses or documents. This sort of proof is, from its very nature, less satisfactory and convincing than immediate real evidence." See also Taylor, Ev. 8th ed. § 554; 1 Wharton, Ev. 3d ed. § 845.

It is a common practice in the trial of causes in the circuit court to permit parties to produce things before the jury for their inspection, and that practice has been approved. Thus, in Tudor Iron Works v. Weber, 129 Ill. 535, which was an action to recover for a personal injury, we held that the torn clothing which plaintiff was wearing when injured might properly be shown to the jury. In American Exp. Co. v. Spellman, 90 Ill. 455, — an action against a carrier for the loss of a can of yeast, — it was held to be proper to allow plaintiff to put in evidence a can similar to the one in which the yeast was shipped for the examination of the jury. In Jupia v. People, 34 Ill. 516, when defendant was on trial for receiving stolen brass couplings, a brass coupling similar to those alleged to have been received was allowed to be submitted to the jury. In other States numerous cases may be found where the same rule of evidence has been adopted. Thus in an accident case, it is held to be within the discretion of the court to allow the plaintiff to exhibit to the jury his injured limb or body. Barker v. Perry, 67 Iowa, 146; Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 118 Ind. 543, 549, 12 West. Rep. 803; Mulhado v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 30 N. Y. 870; Hatfield v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 33 Minn. 180. The clothes of the accused were held admissible in People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 49, and Drake v. State, 75 Ga. 418; the weapon used by the accused, in Wynns v. State, 56 Ga. 118; surgical instruments on a trial under an indictment for illegal operations on a woman, — Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 69; the stick with which a burglar struck the prosecutor in a trial on charge of burglary, — State v. Mordeas, 68 N. C. 207; tools used, where a burglary has been committed, — People v. Larned, 7 N. Y. 445. In State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 89, it was held, in a bastardy case, that the mother of a bastard child might hold it up for the inspection of the jury. It was also held in Hatfield v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 33 Minn. 180, on the trial of an accident case, the trial court had the power to require the plaintiff to walk across the court-room in the presence of the jury, in order that the jury might see how he had been affected by the injury. It is there said: "As the object of all judicial investigations is, if possible, to do exact justice, and obtain the truth in its entire fullness, we have no doubt of the power of court, in a proper case, to require the party to perform a physical act before the jury that will illustrate or demonstrate the extent and character of his injuries. This is in accordance with analogous cases in other branches of the law. When a view of real estate will aid the jury in reaching a conclusion, it is within the discretion of the court to permit it. When an inspection of an article of personal property will aid them, it is not infrequent to cause the article to be brought into court for the same purpose. Lins v. Taylor, 8 Post. & F. 781; Lewis v. Hartley, 7 Car. & P. 405. The practice in patent and in certain equity cases, of allowing tests to be applied before the court, is somewhat analogous in principle. So is the practice of divorce courts, of ordering an examination of the person of the party in certain cases. It is a common practice to allow plaintiffs, in actions for personal injuries, to exhibit to the jury their wounds, in order to show their extent, or to enable a surgeon to demonstrate their nature and character. This has been held proper. Mulhade v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 30 N. Y. 870. If for these purposes, a plaintiff may exhibit his injuries, there would seem to be no reason why, under proper circumstances, he may not be required to do the same thing for a like purpose upon request of the defendant." See also 1 Wharton, Ev. 8d ed. § 845. In Nutter v. Ricketts, 6 Iowa, 92, where there was a controversy in regard to two horses, and the trial court allowed the jury to go in the court-house yard and inspect the horses, the action of the court was sustained. It is there said: "There is no objection, in principle, to a jury seeing an object which is the subject of testimony. By this means they may obtain clearer views, and be able to form a better opinion." See also 1 Hale, P. C. 635. In Cozens v. Higgins, 8 Keyes, 206, in an action of trespass quare clausum, the court of appeals held that it was not error to permit the plaintiff to put in evidence a photographic view of the plaintiff's cellar after the trespass. In German Theological School v. Dubuque, 64 Iowa, 788, a stereoscopic view of property injured by water was held admissible evidence.

Other cases might be cited where the same doctrine is laid down, but we have referred to enough to establish the rule that on a trial, in a proper case, things may be exhibited to the jury. And, if evidence of that character may be brought before the jury, upon the same principle we perceive no good reason why a jury may not, under proper regulations established by the court, go upon and view premises which are the subject matter of the litigation. Had the plaintiff procured a careful survey and plat of the premises, showing the location with reference to streets and alleys, showing the location of all buildings, and showing the improvement made by the city, such a paper would have been competent evidence to go to the jury. Had a photograph or picture of the premises been taken, it would have been competent evidence to go to the jury. If a plat or photograph of the premises would be competent evidence, why not allow the jury to look at the property itself instead of a picture of the same? There may be cases where a trial court should not grant a view of the premises, where it would be expensive, or cause delay, or where a view would serve no useful purpose. But this affords no reason for a ruling that the power to order a view does not exist or should not be exercised in any case. If the appellant desired to control the effect the view might have on the jury in connection with the other evidence introduced, that might have been done by an appropriate instruction; but, as no instruction was asked on that point, he is in no position to complain.

In what cases a view was allowed at common law is a subject upon which the authorities we have examined are not yet very clear. But a view by jury, as we understand the subject, is sanctioned by the common-law practice. In Stearns on Real Actions, 102, the author says: "In the ancient practice there were two kinds of view on real actions: (1) view by the party; (2) view by the jury." The author further says: "View by the jury was allowed in several real actions, as assize of novel disseisin, waste, and assize of nuisance. In these cases, therefore, a view by the party, being rendered unnecessary, was not permitted by the law. 8 Hen. VI. 27; 50 Edw. III. 11. The design of this proceeding was to enable the jury better to understand the matter in controversy between the parties. It was not confined to real actions, but was allowed in several personal actions for an injury to the realty, as trespass quare clausum fregit, trespass on the case, and nuisance." In Burrows' note in 1 Burr. 253, the practice in regard to jury views, as settled upon by the king's bench, is stated by the reporter: "Before 4 and 5 Anne, chap. 16, § 8, there could be no view till after the cause had been brought on to trial. If the court saw the question involved in obscurity, which might be cleared up by a view, the cause was put off, that the jurors might have a view before it came on to be tried again. The rule for a view proceeded upon the previous opinion of the court or judge, at the trial, 'that the nature of the question made a view not only proper, but necessary;' for the judges at the assizes were not to give way to the delay and expense of a view, unless they saw that the cause could not be understood without them. However, it often happened in fact that upon the desire of either party causes were put off for want of a view, upon specious allegations from the nature of the question that 'a view was proper,' without going into the proof, so as to be able to judge whether the evidence might not be understood without it. This circuitry occasioned delay and expense; to prevent which 4 and 5 Anne, chap. 16, § 8, empowered the courts at Westminster to grant a view in the first instance previous to the trial. As a view might be of use, and in this shape was attended with no delay and with but little expense, it became the practice to grant them of course upon the motion of either party." In 2 Tidd, Pr. 795, in speaking on the subject, the author says: "In actions of waste, trespass quare clausum, and other actions where it appears to the court in vacation to be proper and necessary that the jurors . . . who are to try the issue should for the better understanding of the evidence have a view of the . . . lands or place in question, the court or judge will grant a rule for such view, pursuant to the Statute 4 Anne and 6 Geo. IV. chap. 50, § 23. . . . Before the making of the above Statute, there could have been no view till after the cause had been brought on to trial, when, if the court saw the question involved in any obscurity which might be cleared up by a view, the cause was put off, that the jurors might have a view before it came on again." See also Sellon, Pr. 449. If at common law, independent of any English statute, the court had the power to order a view by jury, as we think it plain the court had such power, as we have adopted the common law in this State our courts have the same power.

It is argued by the counsel, because the Legislature has provided for a view in condemnation cases, that it should be held that a view was unauthorized in all other cases. We do not regard this position well taken. The Eminent Domain Act does not merely permit the court in a condemnation proceeding to allow the jury to view the premises, but the Statute absolutely requires the court to do so on the application of either party. The Statute is imperative. It declares said jury shall, at the request of either party, go upon the land. Rev. Stat. chap. 47, § 9. The fact, therefore, that the Statute makes it obligatory on the court to permit the jury on the application of either party to view the premises on the trial of a case under the Eminent Domain Act, has no bearing whatever on the question whether the court has the power in the exercise of this discretion to order a view. Here it is apparent that the jury could obtain a much better understanding of the issue presented by the pleadings by a view of the premises, and, in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, we think the court did not err in allowing the view.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

John HASTINGS

v.

William C. GRIMSHAW.

(.....Mass.....)

The right to a dock between low-water mark and the channel of Acushnet River may be reserved, under Acts 1806, chap. 18, authorizing owners to build and extend wharves below low-water mark in said river, on the conveyance by the owner of the adjacent land to low-water mark or a point below it.

(May 19, 1891.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Bristol County (Staples, J.) for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages because of defendant's alleged trespass upon plaintiff's wharf and dock property, in which a verdict had been directed in plaintiff's favor. Judgment on the verdict.

Plaintiff built and maintained a wharf, with an adjoining dock, extending into the Acushnet River, at the east end of Grinnell Street in New Bedford. Defendant, claiming to act under a license derived from the City Manufacturing Company, on May 1, 1889, placed in the dock wooden floats or stagings, one of which had a boat-house erected on it, and all of which were used in connection with defendant's business of letting boats for hire. The floats and boats were in part at least attached to defendant's wharf and moorings.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for this alleged trespass on his property, and defendant put in evidence a deed of certain property from plaintiff to Wilcox, whose title had become vested in the City Manufacturing Company.

Defendant asked a ruling that upon all the evidence plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and also one that by a proper construction of the deeds in evidence the title to the locus in

NOTE.—Right of riparian owners to dock to low-water mark.

The Massachusetts Ordinance of 1647, which gave to the proprietor of the upland property in the shore between high and low water mark, secured to such proprietor, not merely an easement, but a property in the land in fee, with power to reclaim it by building wharves so as to exclude navigation, provided he did not cut off his neighbors' access to their houses or lands. Henry v. Newburyport, 5 L. R. A. 179, and notes, 149 Mass. 582; Poore, Const. Ancient Charter of New England, pt. 1, p. 921.

An invasion of the owner's right to soil between high and low water mark, and his subsequent dispossession, is trespass to real estate and disseisin, the same as though it were upland. Ladies Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Halstead, 58 Conn. 144; Nichols v. Lewis, 15 Conn. 187.

The riparian proprietor has an exclusive right to the soil between high and low water mark for the purpose of erecting wharves and storehouses thereon. East Haven v. Hemingway, 7 Conn. 186.

The subsisting right to construct such improvements as wharves, piers, landings, etc., is not incompatible with the State's licensing the soil covered by water for uses not subversive of such right, and which must yield to the riparian owners' paramount right of making improvements, when actually exercised. Hess v. Muir, 8 Cent. Rep. 891, 65 Md. 586.

A riparian proprietor cannot be deprived of his paramount right to improve and occupy the land covered by water to the line of navigability without due process of law, nor can it be taken from him and devoted to public use without compensation. *Brisbane v. quo was in the City Manufacturing Company.

The court declined to give these rulings, directed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff and to assess the damages, and at defendant's request reported the case for the determination of the Supreme Judicial Court.

Messrs. Charles W. Clifford and Henry H. Crapo for plaintiff.

Mr. E. L. Barney for defendant.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case it is unnecessary to consider particularly the deeds under which the plaintiff derived his title. It is enough to say that on April 20, 1888, he was the owner of the locus described in the declaration so far as there could be private ownership of that property, and that he was also the owner of the land which he conveyed on that day to Thomas B. Wilcox, which was subsequently conveyed to the City Manufacturing Company, under whose license the defendant justifies the alleged trespass. The question presented is whether by that deed the plaintiff's rights in the property which was used as a dock passed to Wilcox, and if not, whether after the conveyance of the adjacent land to low-water mark, or to a point below low-water mark, he could still retain a title in the dock between that land and the channel, such as would enable him to maintain a suit for a trespass.

His title to the property used as a dock was originally acquired under Stat. 1806, chap. 18, which is printed in the margin of page 209 of volume 108 of the Massachusetts Reports. Under that Statute the owners of land on Acushnet River in the neighborhood where his lot is situated are authorized "to erect, continue and maintain wharves parallel with the line of their several lots as they abut upon said river, said wharves to extend to the channel of said river if the owners of said lots think proper;" and they are given like authority to provide docks within the same limits.

In Hamlin v. Pairpoint Mfg. Co., 141 Mass. 51, 2 New Eng. Rep. 143, is the following language in reference to this Act: "This (Statute) operated as a legislative grant to the owners of lots of an interest in the soil between their lots and the channel of the river. Whether it gave them an absolute fee without any restrictions, or whether since the passage of Stat. 1866, chap. 149, they are subject to the regulations of the harbor commissioners, and to what extent, it is not necessary to consider in this case. The Act certainly gave them a possessory title for the purpose of building wharves, sufficient to enable them to maintain trespass if their rights are invaded." See also, to the same effect, Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 203. This was an additional right of property outside of the former land of each of the riparian proprietors, created by the Statute in favor of those who then owned the lots. It was a title to the adjacent land, and to the water over it, subject to certain rights in the public. There is no good reason why a large lot held under such a title cannot be carved up and conveyed in different parcels, as flats which are held under a title of a similar kind and originating in a similar way may be separated from the land above and be sold in different parts. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 485; Mayhew v. Norton, 17 Pick. 860; Porter v. Sullivan, 7 Gray, 441. See also, for adjudications in regard to similar titles, Goodell v. Larsson, 42 Md. 348, 378; Power v. Tassonella, 25 Gratt. 786; Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 490; Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 609; Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 538, 596, 597.

We are of opinion that the plaintiff might, if he chose, sell the land above high-water mark, or sell that and a part of the land covered with water, and retain his wharf and his dock, or any part of either of them.

It is very clear that he did not intend to sell the dock. His deed to Wilcox described the granted premises by a boundary which plainly excluded the dock. Other rights and privileges were expressly given in connection with the property sold, and it is therefore implied that he did not intend to give any in the dock, except perhaps the right to pass over it to gain access to the property sold.

The plaintiff having a right to retain the dock for himself when he sold the adjacent land, and having intended to retain it, and having used apt words in his deed to express his intention as the owner of it, the defendant was a trespasser in the use which he made of it, and the instructions of the court were correct, and the verdict was rightly returned for the plaintiff.

Judgment on the verdict.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. Heydrick and Carl I. Heydrick, for appellant:

A purchaser at treasurer's sale upon a double assessment is entitled to recover from the township taxes paid by him upon such sale, and also the township taxes thereafter paid by him in redemption of the land from a subsequent sale to the county upon a like double assessment, the taxes upon the land having been paid by the owners thereof upon other and proper assessments.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to the Act of 1856 the rule "caveat emptor" was held applicable to the sale of lands for taxes in the same manner as to judicial sales. That Act provided that the rule should not apply to tax sales in certain cases, viz., when the land sold did not lie in the county where the taxes had been actually paid, and where the sale had been made upon a double assessment. Perhaps the Statute was unnecessary. If a sheriff who held no writ against the owner of property, or a writ that had been already satisfied by the payment of the debt, interest and costs in full, should nevertheless proceed to sell the property, his act would be unauthorized and illegal, and, if no other question was involved, would not affect the title of the owner, or confer any right on the purchaser. For the same reason, if the treasurer, who is authorized to collect unpaid taxes by the sale of the land against which they are charged, should receive full payment of the taxes and costs, the lien of the taxes would be discharged, and the power of the officer to make the sale devested. Laird v. Hiester, 24 Pa. 452; Montgomery v. Meredith, 17 Pa. 42; Breisch v. Cox, 81 Pa. 386.

If, notwithstanding such payment and its legal consequences, the treasurer should proceed to sell, the rule caveat emptor ought not to apply, for the reason that the treasurer, being without the power to sell, can make no sale, and the attempt to do so can impose no liability and confer no rights on anyone. If the authority to make the sale exists, the rule applies, and the regularity of the preliminary proceedings, the extent of the tract, and the value of the land, are at the risk of the purchaser. Whether he gets his money's worth or not he cannot be heard to complain. If, however, there is no such tract as that offered for sale, or if the taxes have been previously paid the officer has nothing to sell, and no sale can be made. The conditions on which the law clothes him with the power to sell do not exist. The attempt to make a sale under such circumstances is an unauthorized assumption of power which does not exist, and one who has become a purchaser at such a sale has a right to have his money returned to him. This was held in the recent case of Bredin v. Cranberry Top. Road Comrs., 87 Pa. 441, which was an action by a purchaser at such a sale to recover so much of his bid as was in the hands of the township.

The plaintiff in the case now before us became a purchaser at the tax sales in 1877 of a tract of land in Pinegrove Township, Venango County, assessed as 290 acres in tract No. 2,682, in the name of J. B. Carson & Co., owners. In 1878, the same tract was struck down to the county. They held it until 1884, when they called the attention of the plaintiff to the fact that his time to redeem had expired, and offered to permit him to redeem the tract. This he did. He afterwards discovered on investigation that there was a double assessment of this tract, and that the taxes upon it had been regularly paid by the owners. This suit was then brought to recover so much of the whole amount paid as was in the hands of the township. As to that part of the claim which is for money paid at the sale of 1877, the defendant pleads the Statute of Limitations; and to that part of it which is for money paid by way of redemption in 1884, it relies on the fact that the money was not paid under duress, but voluntarily, and alleges that the plaintiff is bound thereby. This suit was not brought until 1889. There is no evidence showing an intent on the part of the officers to defraud, or to conceal the real facts in the case, such as is necessary to prevent the running of the Statute from the date of the payment. The Statute of Limitations is therefore well pleaded as to the money paid in 1877. That paid in 1884 is not affected by the Statute and we are to inquire into the right of the plaintiff to recover. In a certain sense the money was voluntarily paid, for the plaintiff was under no legal form of duress at the time, but the same thing may be said of the payment of his bid in 1877. The taxes were not assessed against him. He had no interest in the tract, but volunteered to bid upon it, became the purchaser, and paid his bid. Nevertheless, it is conceded that but for the Statute of Limitations he could recover the amount so paid. Why? Because the taxes in this tract had been paid, and it was subject to no lien or burden that could authorize a sale. The second or double assessment was unauthorized. The taxes assessed under it were illegal, and their nonpayment gave the treasurer no authority to make the sale. The purchaser who paid his money at such sale got nothing for it. The whole transaction was a mistake, —was illegal and void. This is the reason on which the recovery in Bredin v. Cranberry Top. Road Comrs. must rest, and on which this plaintiff could have recovered the amount of his bid if the Statute had not run. But the state of things existing in 1877 continued down to 1884. The assessment being unauthorized, under which the sale to the county was made, that sale conferred no title. There was nothing to be paid to the county by way of redemption, therefore, and the accruing taxes under the same illegal assessment were not a charge on the land. When the plaintiff paid his money to the county by way of redemption and settlement of accruing taxes, he discharged no obligation, and he acquired no rights. He simply paid over so much more money under the influence of the unauthorized and illegal acts of the taxing officers. Although in their hands, it was still his money. They had no claim upon it, and no right in law or morals to withhold it from him. The difficulty with the defense is that the plaintiff is not complaining of a mere irregularity, or a neglect of some statutory requirement on the part of the officers against which voluntary payment might relieve, but he complains that the taxes on this tract were paid in full by the owners, and that thereby the demands of the public, and the power of the taxing officers, were alike exhausted. This being true, the double assessment and the taxes charged under it were illegal and void. They impose no liability on the land or its owner, and confer no rights on the county or township. They had no right to take, and they have no right to hold, the money so paid.

oided in the Supreme Court of New York is an adjudication directly in point. It fully sustains the views of the learned judge in the case at bar, and Mr. Justice Mullin, writing for affirmance, in the course of a singularly exhaustive opinion, says: "Having been once a part of the British empire, we take judicial notice that the common law was in force within her dominions at the time of our separation. And we presume, also, that that law remains unchanged, in the absence of proof to the contrary."

The general rule.

It is a very general presumption that things once proved to have existed in a particular state shall be understood to retain that state or condition, until competent evidence establishes the contrary. Littlefield v. Brooks, 60 Me. 475; Whilden v. Planters & M. Bank, 64 Ala. 1; Blackburn v. State, 28 Ohio St. 146; Eames v. Eames, 41 N. H. 177; Titlow v. Titlow, 54 Pa. 216; Ripley v. Babcock, 18 Wis. 425; O'Neil v. New York & S. P. Min. Co. 3 Nev. 141; Mullen v. Pryor, 12 Mo. 307; Sullivan v. Goldman, 19 La. Ann. 12; Rixford v. Miller, 49 Vt. 819; Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172; Leport v. Todd, 32 N. J. 124; Goldie v. McDonald, 78 Ill. 606; Jay v. Carthage, 48 Me. 353; Daniels v. Hamilton, 62 Ala. 105.

The rule laid down in Arayo v. Currell, 1 La. 541, and Crozier v. Hodge, 3 La. 353, is that if the court has no means of information as to what the law of another country or State is, it will act upon its own laws. But if such country once constituted part of the same kingdom or government with that where the court sits, and they were governed by the same laws, the court will take judicial notice of the laws which prevailed in both before their separation, as matter of public history, and presume them unchanged, till the contrary be shown. The court says: "We have looked into the jurisprudence on this subject, and do not discover that the different States of the Union require proof that the common law prevails in each, or that it has ever been deemed necessary to establish by testimony that the same system governs in England. It is true they require proof of British statutes which never were in force in their own State." Holmes v. Broughton, 10 Wend. 75, 78; Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. 447; Cutler v. Wright, 22 N. Y. 472.

People v. Calder, 30 Mich. 88.

It having been shown, without contradiction, what the written law of Baden was in 1832, the law presumes that it has remained so, until legal proof of a change.

Raynham v. Canton, 8 Pick. 298.

nership proved to exist still continues (1 Cow. & Hill's notes, 236); and so a state of war proved to exist three years ago is presumed in law to be still existing, unless the contrary be shown, but the law indulges no presumption at the present time that it will continue three longer. Covert v. Gray, 34 How. Pr. 450.

So by parity of reason, when personal property has been shown to belong to a person prior to his death, it will be presumed to have been his property at his death, and to have gone to his executors. *Hanson v. So, ownership of personal property is presumed to continue till a sale is shown. Mere change of possession does not suffice to control the presumption (*Magee v. Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testator gave one fourth of his residuary estate to the community of Hochhausen, a municipality situated in the Grand Duchy of Baden, a State of the German Empire; and the question raised upon the settlement of the accounts of his executor was whether it has legal capacity to take its distributive share of the personal estate, no claim being made upon the realty. The surrogate decreed adversely to the claim of the legatee; his decree reciting that the proofs were insufficient to allow it to take any of the property, or to be a legatee under the laws of this State. This decree has been affirmed by the general term. The surrogate expressly found that the legatee had been a municipal body for the past nine hundred years, but refused to find that by the unwritten or by the written law of the country it was authorized to take and hold bequests of personal property, or to hold personal property as a corporation. In so ruling upon the question of the legatee's legal capacity, I think the surrogate has erred. By a competent witness, in the person of the German vice-consul, who, before entering upon the foreign service of the German Empire, had filled a judicial position and was acquainted with the laws of the different States comprising that Empire, it was proved that the Grand Duchy of Baden had an unwritten and a written law. By the unwritten law of the county "communities," by which term a city or township was characterized, had a right to acquire and to manage property, and to take by bequest. A copy of the laws and statutes of the Grand Duchy, printed by governmental authority in the official printing office in 1832, was offered in evidence, and from it proof was given that "every community has a right to administer its affairs as a community, and to manage property independently for itself," and that "all movable and immovable property of communities is the property of the citizens;" as "a corporation," or "as a body," or "as a whole" (the German word in the Act being the equivalent of these terms). This witness gave the only evidence in the case, and nothing was offered in contradiction of it, nor any other proof given upon the question of what was the law of the domicile of this legatee. But because it appears that, since this publication of the Grand Ducal Laws and Statutes in 1832, a Legislature has been in existence, and that the evidence of the witness that these Statutes and the unwritten law, concerning which he had testified, remained in force, was predicated upon the fact that, by virtue of his official position, he would have been made acquainted with any changes by legislative enactment, it was thought that the proofs were insufficient. The surrogate held that it must be shown that the law relied upon to establish the corporate capacity was in force at the time of the testator's death, and that the evidence here was merely hearsay, and therefore incompetent. He also held, upon the authority of Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41, that there was no presumption of the continued existence of the earlier law. That case is not controlling upon the question here. The books offered upon the trial in that case, as containing the laws of France, were the publication of a private person. They were not proven nor did they purport to have been published by governmental authority, and were there seen for the first time by the witness. Moreover, one of the volumes was edited at a date subsequent to the transaction to which they were sought to be made applicable. Nor was it considered that the evidence of the witness as to the reception of these private works in the French courts amounted to proof of that fact. Upon the question of whether the presumption should prevail that a law once shown to have existed continued the same until the time of the event, about which the controversy turned, the court refused to pass definitely, as being unimportant to the decision. Chief Judge Folger intimated, however, pretty strongly, on the authority of Raynham v. Canton, 8 Pick. 293, that if the question of presumption was in the case, the court would have to make it. In Raynham v. Canton, in connection with proofs relating to a marriage in Rhode Island in 1817, a volume of the laws of that State, published by its authority in 1798, was offered; but it was rejected upon the mere objection or denial interposed by counsel that the law so evidenced was not the law at the time of the marriage. Judge Parker, delivering the opinion of the supreme court, in reversal of the judgment, held that, "the law being proved to have existed in the manner above stated, it must be presumed to exist until proved by as good evidence to have been repealed." I think the rule in the Massachusetts case should be adopted by us as correct, upon principle. The rule of presumption, as applied to the continuance of a law, may well rest upon the same basis that is found for similar presumptions in many human affairs. In Greenleaf on Evidence (vol. 1, § 41), the author states the rule that "when the existence of a person, a personal relation, or a state of things is once established by proof, the law presumes that the person, relation or state of things continues to exist as before, until the contrary is shown, or until a different presumption is raised from the nature of the subject in question." In People v. Manhattan Co., 9 Wend. 351, is an illustration of the rule, where it was held that, a corporation having been shown to have been legally created, it is "in judgment of law supposed to continue to exist until the contrary is shown." If in such instances the presumption should obtain, how much greater the reason for it in the case of a public law in a foreign state or country. In addition to the Massachusetts case of Raynham v. Canton, there is to be found authority for the rule in the opinions of the courts of other States. In People v. Calder, 30 Mich. 85, the question arose as to the law governing marriage in the State of New York in 1869. A volume of New York Statutes, printed in 1853, was held to be competent proof of what the law was; the court considering that, as no proof was offered to indicate any change in the law, the jury might fairly presume that it continued as it was. In Harryman v. Roberts, 52 Md. 64, a volume of Ohio Revised Statutes, published in 1860, was admitted as evidence of the existing law of that

State, when the question to which it was made applicable arose in 1879. And see State v. Patterson, 2 Ired. L. 846.

It may be observed that the very notion of a law, as furnishing a rule of government or of conduct, suggests permanence as a characteristic, and does not involve the idea of change. I am led to the opinion that, when proof of a law of a foreign State has been given from a publication made under governmental authority, the rules and principles of evidence entitle it to be considered as the existing law of the land, in the absence of some equally good evidence that it has been changed or repealed.

We have, then, in this legatee a collective body of individuals, which has existed for past hundreds of years as a municipality, under the description of a "community." It had acquired, and by the unwritten or common law it possessed and exercised, certain rights of self-government and powers to acquire and to manage property for itself. By enactment of the Grand Ducal government, its franchises and powers were recognized and confirmed to it. The public statutes, in providing that all the property of a community is the property of its citizens, as a corporation or as a body, in fact, thereby invested the existing municipal body aggregate with an essential attribute of a corporation. This legislation would seem to have amounted to an incorporation by sovereign recognition and grant of powers and franchises. But, whether chartered or incorporated by statute or not, we are bound to consider the community as an artificial legal person. In Germany, in the eye of the law, it is a "judicial person," according to the evidence of the witness in this case, as under the Roman law, in the classification of the writer Savigny, it was a "juristical person." It is conceded by the law such powers and rights as to give it the character of individuality and to enable it to take, hold and administer upon property. The ability to take the testamentary bequest depends upon the law of the legatee's domicile. Our laws do not prohibit the bequest or the taking, and the sole question to be considered relates to the legatee's capacity. See Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 48 N. Y. 424. When we find that by the customary or common law of the place of its domicile, confirmed by a public statute, this "Community" was entitled to take, hold and manage property in the right of its citizens, as a whole, or as an aggregate body incorporate, we need proceed no further in search of capacity to take the legacy.

For the reasons stated, I think that the judgment of the General Term, and so much of the surrogate's decree as has been appealed from, should be reversed, and that it should be decreed that this appellant is entitled to take its share of the personality under the bequest in the will, with costs to the appellant here and in the courts below, to be paid out of the estate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUPREME COURT.

Re Petition of Orville S. WILSON for a Writ of Habeas Corpus.

(.... Mackey....)

1. A peddler to be within a legislative description which includes those who sell and deliver small wares from house to house need not be personally interested in the sales; he may work on a salary.
2. Goods imported from another State become subject to state taxation in the hands of the importer as soon as the original form and package in which they were imported is broken; hence, the agent of a nonresident manufacturer who sells at wholesale merchandise in small packages which are packed in boxes for transportation, under the agreement that he will sell the contents of a certain percentage of the boxes at retail from house to house as an advertisement, and credit the wholesale purchaser with the proceeds, may be compelled to procure a pedler's license before complying with his agreement, and it is immaterial whether the boxes which the agent is to dispose of are shipped directly to him or reach him indirectly through the wholesale purchaser.
3. A license tax on peddlers is not necessarily an unconstitutional regulation of commerce.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Wise Garnett, with Mr. W. V. R. Berry, for petitioner:

The salaried agents of a manufacturing company selling from door to door are not peddlers. The petitioner's claim is that even under the definition in the ordinance he is not a peddler. Nevertheless, if this definition goes beyond the recognized and ordinary meaning of the term the Legislative Assembly exceeded its power in so doing.

The original meaning of the word "peddler" is an itinerant trader, traveling about from place to place with a pack on his back and dealing in small commodities; one whose whole stock is carried about upon his person.

Wedgwood, Dictionary of Etymology; Chambers, Cyclopædia, Hawkers and Peddlers.

A peddler, now, is a small retail trader of cheap articles who travels from house to house, without any fixed business domicile, carrying his entire stock of merchandise with him, either on his back or drawn after him. The main idea is that he is itinerant, ambulatory, without any fixed place of business, irresponsible.

Hagner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is insisted first, upon the part of the petitioner, that he is not amenable to the penalty prescribed by the Act of the Legislative Assembly of this District, because he cannot properly be considered a peddler within the correct meaning of the term. We have been referred to several definitions, as given in dictionaries of authority, to support the contention that the word necessarily signifies an itinerant dealer in a variety of petty wares and articles, which he buys and sells again to make a profit for himself. And it is urged that as Wilson derived no profit by way of percentage or otherwise from the sale of the individual parcels of soapine, but was paid only by a salary for his labor, he is not within the meaning of the law. But we think the fact that the seller was paid in this form, rather than by a special profit on each individual parcel as sold, cannot exempt him from the category of a peddler if he is otherwise within the intent of the Act. If such were to be the result, a merchant might send a number of persons through a city or State, disposing of goods precisely as peddlers do in every other respect, but paying them by salary or wages not regulated by the profits upon the particular sales, and thus escape the operation of the license tax charged to persons who are otherwise no more peddlers than such agents would be. In the language of the supreme court in Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 444, 6 L. ed. 687: "It is impossible to conceal from ourselves that this is a varying of the form without varying the substance. It is treating a prohibition which is general as if it were confined to a particular mode of doing the forbidden thing." Nor does the fact that the petitioner was selling the goods of another, which he himself had never purchased for sale, exempt him from the operation of the Act. These points are expressly decided in the case of Com. v. Gardner, 183 Pa. 285, 7 L. R. A. 266, to which we shall hereafter more particularly refer. In the Act before us, the Legislative Assembly distinctly described the class of persons they intended to include in the designation of "peddlers;" and if this person was offering for sale, from house to house, the parcels of soapine and delivering them at the time of sale, he came within that description.

We have no doubt the Legislative Assembly had the power to pass such License Acts. Its 19 L. R. A.

general power to do so has been effectively recognized by Congress in laws amending or modifying them from time to time; and particular parts of them have been repeatedly sustained by our courts. Cooper's Case, McArth. & M. 250; District of Columbia v. Oyster, 4 Mackey, 285, 1 Cent. Rep. 84; District of Columbia v. Waggaman, 4 Mackey, 328, 1 Cent. Rep. 828. In another case, this court held a particular provision of the License Act void. Re Hennick, 5 Mackey, 490, 7 Cent. Rep. 357. But the provision then under consideration exacted a license tax from commercial agents, who by clause 8 of sec. 24 of chap. 69 of the License Act of August, 1871, as amended by chap. 49 of the Act of 1872, were taxed as follows:

"Commercial agents shall pay two hundred dollars annually. Every person whose business it is, as agent, to offer for sale goods, wares or merchandise by samples, catalogue or otherwise, shall be regarded as a commercial agent." Of course this only applied to persons who "offer for sale," whether the offer was made "by samples or by catalogues or otherwise," and had no reference to those who sell and deliver the goods at the time of the sale. Such persons are known as drummers, who solicit orders by exhibiting samples, or by catalogue, or in any other way, and not those who actually sell and deliver the goods at the time, as peddlers do and as Wilson was doing. The general power of the Legislative Assembly to pass such Acts was also recognized by the supreme court in Welch v. Cook, 97 U. S. 542, 24 L. ed. 1112. Indeed, it seems impossible to question it, unless we are prepared to deny to the District the ordinary powers of a municipality, absolutely indispensable in a city circumstanced like this. That the Legislative Assembly may in some other instances have exceeded its just authority, in passing particular enactments under the general power, may perhaps be; but we are speaking of its general power to enact Acts requiring traders and others to take out licenses, and this we have never heard seriously questioned.

A competent legislative authority has the right to place in a recognized category of offenders, and to punish, persons not previously so classed. Thus Congress denounced persons engaged in the slave trade as guilty of piracy, although that offense had never before been embraced within the definition of piracy; and slavetraders thereafter became punishable as pirates, and prosecutions have repeatedly been had under that law.

Congress, in sec. 3244, subsec. 11, Rev. Stat., 625, describes "peddlers of tobacco" as follows: "Any person who sells or offers to sell manufactured tobacco, snuff or cigars, traveling from place to place, in the town or in the country, shall be regarded as a peddler of tobacco." If this Statute had simply imposed a license tax upon the occupation of a "peddler in tobacco," it would be proper to have recourse to the signification of the word at the time the law was passed, to ascertain whether the person charged was comprehended within the general epithet. But when the Legislature saw fit to declare that a person who commits certain enumerated acts shall be considered a peddler and treated as such, it is too late to resort to lexicographers to ascertain whether the Legislature observed the dictionary definition of the occupation, according to antecedent usage or strict etymological rules. The legislative definition outweighs the dictum of the lexicographers.

We might refer to numerous cases where the courts have held that the word "peddler" in a statute comprehended persons whose acts were less within the strict limits insisted on by the petitioner's counsel than they are as used in the ordinance before us. Thus, in State v. Wilson, 2 Lea, 28, vendors of lightning rods were held to be included in an Act requiring a peddler of merchandise to obtain a license. In Chicago v. Barte, 100 Ill. 61, a city ordinance prohibited persons from selling milk from wagons without license. The only authority in the charter of the city relied on for the enactment of the ordinance was a provision that the municipality might tax, regulate, suppress and prohibit hawkers and peddlers. But the court held the word "peddler" was used in the charter in an unrestricted sense, and authorized the city to exact a license from persons who sold milk; and that it made no difference that the accused had regular customers whom he supplied daily.

In Warren v. Geer, 117 Pa. 207, 9 Cent. Rep. 307, the court held that a provision in the charter authorizing the borough to require a license for peddling market produce and other articles included sales of books; and that a book canvasser was properly convicted under a borough ordinance for acting without a peddler's license, and that there was nothing unreasonable in this requirement.

Although there are many cases where the courts have held a general expression in a statute included persons further removed from the usual definition of such expression than the petitioner was from the supposed dictionary signification of the word "peddler," we have found no case where the courts have denied to the Legislature the right to give its own statement of the features that should thereafter constitute an offense hitherto unknown to its definition.

We must regard the petitioner as a peddler within the meaning of the Act of the Legislative Assembly; and that he is punishable as such for selling without a license unless he is exempt upon the other ground of defense urged in his behalf.

That defense is that the Act of the Legislative Assembly is void as being repugnant to the third clause of the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States and with Indian tribes." This involves the consideration of a very important and interesting question, which has repeatedly challenged the attention of the supreme court. In one of the first of these great cases, Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 436, 6 L. ed. 684, the supreme court decided that a state statute requiring an importer of foreign commodities to take out a state license was repugnant to the constitutional provision referred to, as well as to another provision of the Constitution; and that the conviction of an importer for having sold a package of foreign dry goods without such license was illegal.

In defining the line of demarcation between the exclusive power of the government to tax foreign goods imported into a State and the power of the State to levy such tax, after they have reached the State's jurisdiction, Chief Justice Marshall in that case laid down a rule which is thus interpreted by the supreme court in the subsequent case of Wolton v. Missouri 91 U. S. 281, 23 L. ed. 349:

"There is a difficulty, it is true, in all cases of this character, in drawing the line precisely where the commercial power of Congress ends and the power of the State begins. A similar difficulty was felt by this court in Brown v. Maryland, in drawing the line of distinction between the restriction upon the power of the States to lay a duty upon imports, and their acknowledged power to tax persons and property; but the court observed that the two, though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the intervening colors between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding, as colors perplex the vision in marking the distinction between them; but that, as the distinction exists it must be marked as the cases arise; and the court, after observing that it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application, held, that when the importer had so acted upon the thing imported that it had become incorporated and mixed up in the mass of property in the country, it had lost its distinctive character as an import, and became subject to the taxing power of the State; but that while remaining the property of the importer in his warehouses in the original form and package in which it was imported, the tax upon it was plainly a duty on imports prohibited by the Constitution."

This definition has been adopted substantially, if not in exact words, in each of the important cases on the subject since that time. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 490, 30 L. ed. 695; Corson v. Maryland, 120 U. S. 502, 30 L. ed. 699; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 632, 29 L. ed. 260; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 646, 32 L. ed. 818; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 130, 32 L. ed. 869; Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 142, 32 L. ed. 638; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128.

The question therefore in the present case is whether the boxes of soapine obtained by Wilson as part of what is said to have been purchased from the Washington merchant, and subsequently sold by Wilson from door to door by retail, can be considered as continuing the property of the person who imported them into the District of Columbia, remaining in the original form and package in which they were imported; or whether the person who so imported them into the District "had so acted upon the thing imported that it had become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the county (District), as to have lost its distinctive character as an import." If the facts support the first supposition, the tax was illegal; if they support the latter "the goods had become subject to the taxing power of the State (District)."

Upon the statement presented by the petitioner, to which the counsel for the District have assented for the purposes of this argument, it does not clearly appear whether we are to understand the particular boxes so sold as having been imported by the petitioner Wilson or by the Washington merchant.

The statement in one place says "the box sold at retail from door to door by the agent never passes into the hands of the dealers, but is sent to the agent direct from the manufactory, and is sold by him for the Kendall Manufacturing Company, and the proceeds paid to them." This would seem to indicate that the petitioner is to be considered as the importer of those boxes. On the other hand, the statement shows that the practice of the petitioner, as agent of the company, is "to sell a certain number of boxes, at wholesale prices, to the Washington dealers—therefrom to retain one box from each wholesale purchaser, paying him the retail prices therefor by discount on his bill, the purchaser being charged with six boxes and credited with one in his bill, and then to sell this box at retail from door to door for the purpose of advertising the article, stimulating its sales and thereby obtaining customers for the grocers and dealers." This would certainly imply that the dealer must import the particular box in his original package before it can be retained from the six boxes that had been sold to him and charged on his bill at the wholesale prices and afterward credited to him at the retail prices and sold on the streets to obtain customers for the dealers.

If the former supposition is to be taken as correct, of course the agent must receive his assortment of individual boxes in a package together, as it is ridiculous to assume he would receive each box separately, as a specific shipment to him. On the other hand, if the sixth box reaches the city in the package received by the merchant, that package must be opened before the agent can obtain the sixth box when he buys it at retail price from the merchant.

Hence, in either case, before the agent can take the individual box on the street, the package in which it was imported to the District must have been broken; the article must have "lost its distinctive character as an import," and become incorporated and mixed up in the mass of property in the District. The singular, circuitous and rather mysterious arrangement by which the merchant is charged with a box which it is said he never bought; is allowed a retail price for what it is said he never sold; and is credited with the retail price of what never belonged to him, by a person who never sold it to him,—cannot change the character of the transaction. Repeating the words of the chief justice before quoted from Brown v. Maryland, "it is impossible to conceal from ourselves that this is a varying of the form, without a varying of the substance."

The supreme court has contented itself, in the different cases where the point arose, with deciding whether, under the facts in the particular case, the goods upon which it was sought to impose a tax directly or by the exaction of a license had at the time been incorporated and mixed up in the mass of the property of the State, and become subject to its taxing power. In Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 632, 13 L. R. A.

29 L. ed. 260, it was held that coal mined in Pennsylvania and sent in flat boats to New Orleans, to be sold in open market there on account of the owners in Pennsylvania, when it had reached its destination and come to its place of rest for final disposition or use, had become a commodity in the market, and part of the general mass of property of the State, and subject to taxation under its general laws; although after its arrival it was to be sold from the flat boat, without being landed, and for the purpose of being taken out of the country on a vessel bound to a foreign port. If the property described in that case, under the circumstances, had become so incorporated with the mass of the property in the State as to be the subject of state taxation, we cannot see why the individual boxes of soapine in the hands of Wilson were not in the same predicament.

We have carefully examined all the decisions of the supreme court on this subject, and have found nothing in either of them to interfere with these conclusions. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 490, 30 L. ed. 695; Corson v. Maryland, 120 U. S. 502, 30 L. ed. 699; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 180, 32 L. ed. 869; Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 32 L. ed. 687,—were all cases where the person charged was selling by sample goods not yet imported into the State or district; and the courts very reasonably declared that the goods sought to be taxed by means of a license could no more be subjected to a tax by such a sale than they could be if the sale had been conducted by letter through the post-office.

In Wellton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 232, 23 L. ed. 850, from which we have already quoted Justice Field's statement of the definition in Brown v. Maryland, the court held that a state law providing that "whoever shall deal in the selling of patent or other medicines, goods, wares or merchandise, except books, charts and stationery, which are not the growth, produce or manufacture of the State, by going from place to place to sell the same, is declared to be a peddler," and exacting a license tax from such dealers, while making no such requirement where such person sold only such commodities as were produced within the State, was in conflict with the commercial clause of the Constitution, and void because of this discrimination against citizens of other States. But the court said nothing to imply that the tax would have been illegal if the Statute had applied (as ours does) to all citizens alike. Nor does it intimate that the accused could not be held as a peddler, though the definition given in the Statute is as open to etymological criticism as the Act of the District Legislature. A similar decision was made in Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449.

The point of these decisions is emphasized by the opinion in Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754. The Howe Machine Company, which manufactures its machines in Connecticut, had an agent in Nashville, Tenn., who went to Lawrence County to sell machines, and a tax was there demanded of him for a peddler's license, under a state law which required all peddlers of sewing machines to pay a tax. He denied the validity of the Act, but paid the tax to the county clerk, and this suit was brought to recover back the amount so paid. The case was discussed by the court with full examination of authorities; and the opinion concludes as follows: "In all cases of this class, to which the one before us belongs, it is a test question whether there is any discrimination in favor of the State, or of the citizens of the State, which enacted the law. Wherever there is such discrimination, it is fatal. In the case before us the Statute in question, as construed by the supreme court of the State, makes no such discrimination. It applies alike to sewing machines manufactured in the State and out of it. The exaction is not an unusual or unreasonable one. The State, putting all such machines upon the same footing with respect to the tax complained of, had an unquestionable right to impose the burden."

No suggestion was there made that the agent who sold the sewing machines for the foreign manufacturer was not a peddler; and the Supreme Court held he must obtain a peddler's license.

Shortly afterwards the case of Webber v. Virginia, 108 U. S. 850, 26 L. ed. 587, was decided, in which a law of that State was held invalid because of the discrimination against nonresidents which appeared in Walton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 281, 23 L. ed. 849, and was absent in Hove Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754.

The petitioner's counsel referred to a decision said to have been rendered in the Hustings Court in Richmond; and also to a case in the Court of Common Pleas, in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, in which, they contended, the law, as they present it, was settled on this identical subject.

We have not been able to find the former decision; but we have examined the latter case with care. Larkin and others were arrested in the City of Chester for selling soapine without a license, and the court of common pleas held the ordinance void, and inapplicable on two grounds stated in the opinion:

1. Because it was doubtful whether the charter of Chester gave to the city the power to pass an ordinance to license peddling.

But the District of Columbia, as we have seen, undoubtedly possesses that power.

2. Because the sellers of the soapine were not peddlers within the meaning of the city ordinance.

But that ordinance did not specially describe the form of sale which should thereafter constitute "peddling." The Act in force in this District does explicitly contain that description.

That case further differs from the case before us, because no such facts as to the sale of the boxes to the merchant, and the repurchase of them by the agent, seem to have existed there; whereas those important circumstances appear in the agreement filed in the present case.

These differences are sufficient to discriminate that case from the present; but at the best it is only the decision of an inferior court, and we think it erroneous.

But whatever force it might be supposed to have is destroyed by a subsequent decision of the court of appeals of the State in March, 1890, in Com. v. Gardner, 183 Pa. 285, 7 L. R. 12 L. R. A.

A. 666, in which all the points raised before us are in turn considered.

The defendants were indicted for hawking and peddling goods within the County of Schuylkill, contrary to the provisions of the Act of April, 1846.

It appears from the special verdict found by the jury, and from the opinion of the court, that the defendants, who were in the county temporarily for the purpose of making such sales, sold from door to door within said county parcels or packages of soapine or washing powder, being a substitute for soap, etc. That they sold the goods as agents of a manufacturing company whose office, works, members and officers are in Providence, Rhode Island; that the goods were made there and were sold by defendants on account of the company; that the defendants had no interest in the goods, nor in their proceeds, but were paid a salary for their services by the company. The Statute forbids the sale of foreign or domestic goods, wares or merchandise within the county by any person as a hawker or peddler.

The county court entered a verdict of guilty upon the special verdict; and an appeal from this ruling was taken to the court of appeals, where the case was elaborately argued by counsel and discussed by the court.

The court decided that the defendants were "peddlers" within the meaning of the law; "that it was of no consequence if they did not own the articles sold, but acted as the agents of others;" that the prohibition in the law against all peddling in the county was a valid exercise of the police power of the State, and was not in violation of the constitutional right of the citizen secured by the Constitution of the State; that the sale from house to house by agents of goods manufactured in Rhode Island by a company whose members are nonresidents of Pennsylvania is not interstate commerce; and that the law forbidding all peddling within the county does not invade the exclusive right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

In speaking upon the last point the court says: "The citizen of another State may come into Pennsylvania when he will and where he will stay as long as he chooses, open as many places for the sale of his goods as he may see fit, and enjoy the same measure of freedom in regard to the conduct of his business as a native citizen. But when he comes within the State permanently or temporarily he is under the protection of its laws and the correlative duty of obedience rests on him. His rights are equal to, but not above, those of the citizen. He has no more right to sell intoxicating drink without a license than a citizen; no better right to sell cigarettes to children, or oleomargarine to customers, in violation of law, than a citizen. He has no better right to take a pack on his back, or a horse and cart, and engage in peddling, than a citizen. To hold the contrary would be subversive of law and order, and would render the possession of the police power useless to the State."

The facts of the case at bar are less favorable to the defendant than those in 183 Pa., inasmuch as the stratagem of the alleged sale by the agent of the one box of soapine to the merchant and its alleged repurchase did not appear in that case. But if the present case were no worse than that, the decision cited would be a powerful authority in support of the view we have taken.

The resident merchants here are obliged to pay taxes upon their stock in trade and shops, besides paying a license tax. It is hardly fair that persons without any stake in the community, and who contribute nothing in any other form towards the expenses of the government here, should be permitted to carry on their traffic without payment of a license tax; which in the language of the court, in Hove Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754, is "an exaction not unusual or unreasonable."

The judgment of the Police Court against the treasurer having been correct, the application for a habeas corpus is overruled, and the petitioner remanded into custody.

Bradley, J., dissenting:

By the record it appears that the relator has been fined the sum of $55 by the Police Court of the District of Columbia, and that in default of payment he has been committed to the custody of the Intendant of the Washington Asylum, having been tried and convicted upon an information charging him with engaging in the business of a peddler, in selling from house to house an article called soapine, without first having obtained a license therefor. By the agreed statement of facts, it appears that the relator is a regular salaried agent of the Kendall Manufacturing Company, a corporation under the laws of the State of Rhode Island, and there engaged in the manufacture of soapine, a washing powder and substitute for soap; That the soapine sold was sent to the relator by his employer, direct, in a box, and was the property of the manufacturer, although nominally it formed part of a number of boxes sold to some resident dealer at wholesale rates, and without being delivered to such dealer it was repurchased by the manufacturer at retail price.

The effect of this arrangement was to give the dealer an additional discount on his purchase to the extent of the difference between the wholesale and retail price of the box retained, and the sale of the soapine in the retained boxes was intended to advertise the article and stimulate its sale.

This box was opened by the agent of the manufacturer, and its contents, in small packages, sold from door to door at retail price. The manufacturer thereby made no profit on the sales. The relator had no property interest either in the soapine or in the proceeds of the sales.

The relator is charged with the violation of an Act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia of August 28, 1871, amended June 20, 1872, entitled "An Act Imposing a License on Trades, Business and Professions Practiced and Carried on in the District of Columbia," the 36th section of which reads as follows: "Peddlers shall pay fifty dollars annually. Any person who may offer for sale from house to house, or from a wagon, dry goods, fancy goods, notions, toys and similar articles, delivered at the time of the sale shall be known as a peddler."

In behalf of the relator it is claimed:

1. That he is not a peddler, but a salaried agent of a manufacturing company and therefore not included in the law.

2. That if the Act requires of a nonresident manufacturer a license fee as a condition to selling and delivering its manufactures by its agent, it is void, as in conflict with art. 1, § 8, cl. 3, of the Constitution of the United States.

First let us inquire whether the relator comes within the provisions of the law under which he was charged and sentenced.

It needs no examination of definitions by lexicographers to reach the conclusion that the relator was not a peddler in the ordinary signification of the word. By Endicott, J., in a Massachusetts case, a peddler is defined as "an itinerant trader who goes from place to place and from house to house carrying for sale and exposing the goods, wares and merchandise which he carries. He generally deals in small cheap articles such as he can conveniently carry in a cart or on his person."

In Randolph v. Yellowstone Kit, 88 Ala. 472, it is said: "The term 'peddler' has many definitions, more or less full. . . . Its popular definition is a small retail dealer, who, carrying his merchandise with him, travels from house to house or from place to place, exposing his goods for sale and selling them."

According to these definitions and to the popular and accepted meaning of the term he is a dealer or trader in small wares who has no permanent place of business, but who carries his wares with him from place to place or from house to house. He is one who buys to sell again, and whose gains are the profits realized on small sales. A manufacturer who sends his agents into other communities than that of his residence to vend his product either immediately, or by sample, is not a trader or peddler, nor is the agent employed by him in such business. Com. v. Campbell, 83 Pa. 880.

I think that the distinction is well marked and is reasonable, and that this relator cannot be held under the Act referred to, unless it be by the force and stress of the legislative definition which accompanies the provision. This definition is, "Any person who may offer for sale from house to house, or from a wagon, dry goods, fancy goods, notions, toys, and similar articles, delivered at the time of sale," shall be considered a peddler.

The language used is broad enough to cover the case of any person, not a trader or a dealer, who may offer for sale from house to house a single article. But its sense must be governed and restricted by the subject to which it relates and by the connection in which it is used. It relates to peddlers, those who are popularly known as such, and the definition so applied and limited is relieved of the indefiniteness which otherwise attaches to it. It was intended to apply to perambulating dealers who carry about with them a limited stock of small articles, "dry goods, notions, fancy goods, toys and similar articles," for sale.

If this section was intended to apply to others not peddlers in the well-understood popular signification of the word, why was not the limiting term omitted, and the broad descriptive definition left to stand alone as indicating the class intended to be taxed?

If the broad and comprehensive meaning claimed for it was intended by the Legislative Assembly (which I doubt), then I hold that it was not in its power, by its ordinance, to include persons as peddlers who do not fall within the ordinary meaning of that term. Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 288.

The broad meaning attributed to the provision in question would include a person who "as agent for nonresident manufacturers or wholesale dealers, offers for sale merchandise," unless he restricted his offers for sale to one house. But this class was distinctly taxed as commercial agents, under the Act of Aug. 23, 1871, and required to pay a license fee of $250. By the amendment of this Act of June 20, 1872, commercial agents are required to pay $200 annually, and they are defined as "every person whose business it is, as agent, to offer for sale goods, wares or merchandise, by sample, catalogue or otherwise." Acts 2d Sess. p. 60.

Taking the original section it is apparent that it would include the case of the relator, but might not include one who offered for sale by sample or catalogue. The amendment specifically included agents who are sellers by sample or by catalogue, and all others who otherwise offer for sale. Clearly the 3d section of the Act was intended to and does cover cases like that of the relator, as "commercial agents." The difference between the tax of $50 required of a peddler, and $200 required of a "commercial agent" indicates that the former applies to the small perambulating trader, while the latter applies to the agents of manufacturers and wholesale dealers.

The conclusion I have reached is that the relator is not a peddler within the purpose or intent of the Act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, under which he was prosecuted, convicted and sentenced.

Upon the other point made by the relator, that the Act is void as an attempt to regulate "commerce among the States" a subject which under the Constitution is committed exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is contended for the District of Columbia that the provision of the law in question, as construed and applied to the case of the relator, is not repugnant to the Constitution because the importer (the Kendall Mfg. Co.) had so acted upon the thing imported, that it had become incorporated and mixed up in the mass of property in the District, and that it had lost its distinctive character of an import, and become subject to the taxing power of the District of Columbia.

By the District of Columbia it is claimed that a number of boxes of soapine are sold and delivered to a consignee here, and that one of these original packages is purchased from the consignee after it has become part of the general property of the District, and is then broken and sold by the agent. But the agreed fact is that the box which is broken and sold by the agent from door to door never passes into the hands of the dealer, but is sent to the agent direct from the manufacturer. It is the property of the nonresident manufacturer when it enters the district, and it continues to be its property in the hands of its agent until it is sold and delivered to the retail purchasers.

By the majority of the court it is held that the original package or box broken and sold by the agent became a part of the general mass of property, lost its distinctive character as an import and became subject to taxation the moment the original package in the hands of the agent was broken.

In this I am not able to concur, and I approach this constitutional feature of the subject with diffidence and hesitation.

The principle embodied in the proposition that the contents of the box of soapine became a part of the mass of the property in this District when the original package was broken in the hands of the agent, for sale, had its origin in the opinion by Marshall, Ch. J., in the case of Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 442, 6 L. ed. 686.

In that case, an Act of Maryland requiring importers of certain foreign commodities to take out a license for which they should pay $50, before they should be authorized to sell, was declared to be repugnant to that provision of the Constitution which declares that "no State shall without the consent of Congress lay any imposts or duties on imports," etc., and also to the provision which declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

The importer had sold one package of foreign dry goods without having a license.

To the suggestion that the imported article must at some time be subject to the taxing power of the State, and that such power must attach when it came into the State, the court says, page 451: "We cannot admit that this point of time is the instant that the articles enter the country. It is, we think, obvious that this construction would defeat the prohibition. The constitutional prohibition on the States to lay a duty on imports—a prohibition which a vast majority of them must feel an interest in preserving—may certainly come in conflict with their acknowledged power to tax persons and property within their territory. The power and the restriction on it, though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the intervening colors between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding as colors perplex the vision in marking the distinction between them. Yet the distinction exists, and must be marked as the cases arise. Till they do arise it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application. It is sufficient for the present to say, generally, that when the importer has so acted upon the thing imported that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has perhaps lost its distinctive character as an import and has become subject to the taxing power of the State; but while remaining the property of the importer in his warehouse in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax upon it "is too plainly a duty on imports to escape the prohibition of the Constitution."

It is important to remark that the court is here dealing with the subject of the exclusive power of Congress to impose duties upon imports, and not with the subject of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the States.

There can be no doubt that the license tax imposed in the case at bar as a condition to his exercising the right to sell the goods brought into the District of Columbia, by the nonresident manufacturer, is a tax upon the goods themselves in his hands. "All must perceive that a tax on the sale of an article imported only for sale is a tax on the article itself." Brown v. Maryland, supra.

A license tax imposed upon "drummers," or persons who offer for sale by sample, so far as concerns the sale of or offer to sell goods not yet brought into the State, is clearly a tax on the goods themselves, and a regulation of interstate commerce. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 130 U. S. 489, 80 L. ed. 694; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 82 L. ed. 868; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 28 L. ed. 847.

Is the tax imposed by this Act upon goods brought into the District of Columbia, for sale by a nonresident manufacturer, as a condition precedent to his right to sell, a regulation of interstate commerce?

In Brown v. Maryland, under the consideration of this provision of the Constitution the chief justice says:

"The conclusion that the right to sell is connected with the law permitting importation as an inseparable incident is inevitable. . . . Any penalty inflicted on the importer for selling the article in his character of importer must be in opposition to the Act of Congress which authorizes importation. Any charge on the introduction and incorporation of the articles into and with the mass of property in the country must be hostile to the power given to Congress to regulate commerce, since an essential part of that regulation and principal object of it is to prescribe the regular means for accomplishing that introduction and incorporation."

It is then clearly held that the importer has the right to sell the import in its original package, without the burden of any additional tax by the State, by way of license or otherwise, and that it does not lose its exemptive character so long as it remains the property of the importer, in his warehouse, in the original form or package in which it was imported.

When does the imported merchandise become a part of the general property of the State so as to become subject to its general taxing power?

In the case of the resident importer the line of distinction is drawn at the point of sale by the importer, or at the point when the imported package is broken in his hands, when it has lost its distinctive character as an import, and the imported goods, mingled with his other goods, become a part of the mass of the property of the State. But this rule was not stated as being one of universal application, and its application to the case of goods carried from one State into another has been denied. Woodruff v. Parham, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 128, 19 L. ed. 882; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257.

In the former case an ordinance of the City of Mobile imposing a tax upon sales by auctioneers was sustained, when applied to sales by them of goods, the product of other States than Alabama, received by them as consignees and agents and sold in the original and unbroken packages.

In the latter case coal shipped from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, and resting there in the boats and original condition, packages in which it was shipped, held for sale for the agents, was held liable to the assessment of a tax imposed generally upon property within the State; that the coal was a commodity in the market of New Orleans, and that it had become a part of the general property of the State.

It will not do, then, to say in the case at bar that the soapine in the hands of the relator in the broken box, or package, any more than in the unbroken box, has become a part of the mass of the general property of the District.

In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. it is held as within the power of the State among other things, "the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the State or belonging to its population, and upon avocations pursued therein not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce . . . the imposition of taxes upon all property within the State mingled with and forming part of the great mass of property therein. But in making such internal regulations a State cannot impose taxes upon persons passing through the State, or coming into it merely for a temporary purpose, especially if connected with interstate or foreign commerce, nor can it impose such taxes upon property imported into the State from abroad, or from another State and not yet become a part of the common mass of property therein."

Is it reasonable to hold that a nonresident manufacturer coming into this District for the mere temporary purpose of exercising the privilege of sale of his goods under the freedom of interstate commerce, is only protected from local taxation so long as his goods remain in the unbroken package in which he has imported them? If his free right to sell is limited to a sale in unbroken packages, the limitation amounts to a denial of the privilege because all exhibition and inspection are prohibited, inasmuch as the opening or breaking of the package for any purpose subjects the seller to the requirement of the license tax.

The clause of the Constitution under consideration includes commerce with the Indian tribes as under the regulation of Congress. Imagine an Indian trader from one of the tribes coming into a State with a bale of skins and furs, and being informed that under a municipal ordinance similar to this he was free to sell the whole mass, unopened, with package unbroken, but if he opened or exposed them his goods became part of the mass of goods in the State and he was subject to taxation. It would not be tolerated—it would be too plain a violation of that clause of the Constitution. Is it not absurd to hold that an agent may sell without license by sample—but that he may not sell the sample?

It must be that in this case the nonresident manufacturer bringing his goods into the District for the temporary purpose of sale, and retaining them in his actual possession, custody and control, such goods do not become part of the mass of goods in the District of Columbia, until he parts with them by sale, or otherwise changes their status.

It is beyond dispute that it is the free right of the Kendall Manufacturing Company to import its goods into the District of Columbia, because it is a right of interstate commerce. (Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 142, 82 L. ed. 688), and Congress has not exercised its constitutional right of trammeling it with any regulations.

In Brown v. Maryland, the court says: "Commerce is intercourse. One of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic. It is inconceivable that the power to authorize this traffic, when given in the most comprehensive terms with the intent that its efficacy should be complete should cease at the point when its continuance is indispensable to its value. Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient of that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the existence of the entire thing, then, as the importation itself. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce."

Any penalty inflicted on the importer for selling the thing in his character of importer must be in opposition to that freedom of interstate commerce which must exist until Congress under its constitutional power imposes some restrictions. The absence of such regulation means that interstate commerce is free.

In Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 124, 84 L. ed. 187, the court says, with reference to beer imported into the State of Iowa from the State of Illinois and held for sale by the agent of the manufacturers in Iowa, in the original packages in which it was imported, that notwithstanding a prohibitory statute, "they had the right to import this beer into that State, and in the view which we have expressed they had the right to sell it, by which act alone it would become mingled in the common mass of property within the State. Up to that point of time we hold that in the absence of Congressional permission to do so, the State had no power to interfere by seizure, or any other action in prohibition of importation and sale by the foreign or nonresident importer."

The Supreme Court of the United States has been careful, in construing the provisions of the Constitution restricting the powers of the States in their general right of taxation, to limit the decision to the actual case before it, anxious not to interfere with the jealously guarded rights of the States.

It has been held to be regulations of interstate commerce.

A statute laying a tax upon nonresident drummers offering for sale or selling goods, wares or merchandise by sample manufactured or belonging to citizens of other States. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694.

Also a statute requiring a license of itinerant dealers in goods, wares and merchandise, not the growth or produce or manufacture of the State. Walton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847.

Also an Act of the Legislative Assembly, District of Columbia, imposing a tax upon "commercial agents," defining them as "every person whose business it is, as agent, to offer for sale goods, wares or merchandise by sample, catalogue or otherwise," as applied to the case of an agent for a nonresident firm, selling by sample. Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 82 L. ed. 687.

The question in this case is now for the first time presented here. It has not been before the Supreme Court of the United States in any case reported. It demands a new departure, the drawing of a new line of demarkation back of which the State cannot step for the purpose of taxation, and that line in my judgment in this case is the line of sale by the nonresident importer, temporarily in the District for that purpose, of the goods by him imported, whether in upbroken or broken packages.

The case of Stoutenburgh v. Hennick settles the question that the Act in question is not a regulation of Congress.

The relator should be discharged.

v.

E. H. HATFIELD.

(2 Wash. ....)

1. The soil under navigable waters up to high-water mark is, in the State of Washington, by express provisions of the Constitution, as well as by the common-law rule, the property of the State.

2. Riparian rights in the several States are settled by the respective States for themselves.

3. A riparian proprietor on the shore of the sea, or its arms has no right as against the State or its grantees to extend wharves in front of his land below high-water mark.

4. Under Const., art. 15, providing for NOTE.—Navigable waters are public highways.

The confusion of navigable with tide waters, found in the monuments of the common law, long prevailed in this country, to the exclusion of admiralty jurisdiction from our great rivers and inland seas; but the doctrine is now established, that the great lakes and other navigable waters of the country above as well as below the flow of the tide are navigable waters amenable to the admiralty jurisdiction. Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 397, 10 L. ed. 997; Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 50 U. S. 9 How. 471, 13 L. ed. 230; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 53 U. 6. Riparian proprietors on the shore of the navigable waters of the State have no special or peculiar rights in such waters as an incident to their estates.
7. The building by a State or its grantees of wharves upon the shores of navigable waters will not constitute either a taking or damaging of the private property of riparian proprietors for public use.
8. One having valuable improvements on tide lands in actual use for commerce, trade and business prior to the Act of March 28, 1890, has a right as against the riparian proprietor who has never erected any improvements on the shore to maintain them as they were on the passage of that Act, but not to enlarge them prior to purchase of the lands from the State.
